CITY OF WASHINGTON:
OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.
1868.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1868, by

F. & J. RIVES & GEO. A. BAILEY,

In the Clerk's office of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

American citizens abroad, which has been made the special order from day to day, and has given away to other business. If we are to consider that bill at all, I think we had better resolve to consider it to-day; certainly it must be considered soon if at all. It will undoubtedly be amended to some extent, and therefore it will be necessary to send it back to the other House. I would like, if the Senate would consent, to lay the unfinished business over temporarily and let us go on with this bill. I apprehend that it will not be discussed at great length, and that we shall soon arrive at the form in which it will be passed. I ask, therefore, that the unfinished business lie over informally, and that we proceed with the special order for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That requires general consent. The Senator from California asks that the unfinished business lie over for the purpose of considering the bill concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States. Is there any objection?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President. I think that we can dispose of the appropriation bill in less time than we can of the bill the Senator wishes to call up. I think we had better conclude the appropriation bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator from California to propose that this evening be set apart for the consideration of the bill mentioned by him.

Mr. CONNESS. You cannot have a meeting this evening to consider that bill, because you cannot get a full Senate here with the weather in its present condition.

Mr. POMEROY. It is cooler now than it has been, and I think we can meet this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I have but to repeat only more briefly what I have said before, that the Indian appropriation bill, we all know, will be passed, and can be passed in a comparatively short time. I therefore move that it be postponed for the present, and that we proceed with the special order for to-day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is true, as the Senator from California says, that the appropriation bills will probably pass because they must pass; but whether they will pass in a proper way will depend upon whether they are considered at the proper time. The Senate should understand that all the appropriation bills give rise to differences between the two branches which can alone be settled by conference. We have been some two or three weeks in conference on two appropriation bills, the last of which was passed yesterday by both Houses. The Indian appropriation bill involves, apparently, a great deal of difference between the two branches. It will, therefore, necessarily be the subject of conference. I hope that we shall be able to pass it in a few hours to-day, and I have no doubt we shall. There are other appropriation bills which are to follow it, not immediately, but very soon. Between the consideration of this bill and those the honorable Senator from California will have an opportunity to present his measure. I think it will be but a decent regard to what is the absolute and unqualified service of the country that the Indian appropriation bill should be considered now, and that the honorable Senator should consent to allow his bill to be postponed until that passes away from the Senate and goes to a conference committee, and then his bill can be considered before another appropriation bill is brought to the notice of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senate would agree to take that course, and take up this bill after the passage of the Indian appropriation bill, I would consent, but I apprehend that we can get no such agreement as that in the Senate. Now, I wish to say in connection with what I have already said that the appropriation bill will and must pass, and we will stay here until it shall pass. But, sir, the faith of the Republican party of this nation is pledged to carrying out the purposes of the bill to which I have called the attention of the Senate, and so is the faith of the Democratic party of this nation. Both parties represented in this body stand pledged to that if they stand pledged to anything. They have either put that plank in their platforms for the purpose of deception, or else they mean to act upon this proposition, and I hope we shall go on with this measure.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The idea of postponing the consideration of an appropriation bill, which is a measure of absolute necessity for the Government, after you have been considering it and are near its completion, to take up a measure which is of a political character, which both the great political parties of the country, the honorable Senator informs us, have indorsed to some extent, so that it becomes a political question, and, of course, one open to discussion, is a thing, I think, without precedent in the Senate. And I submit to the honorable Senator that he is not in an attitude to force such a measure as that, coming, as I understand it does, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, against a measure which has been receiving the attention of the Senate until it is in a state almost of completion. It is a singular proposition to put that aside to take up a subject which is open to discussion, which, although of importance, will give rise to extended debate and will postpone the appropriation bill to a period when it cannot be properly considered. I submit to the Senator that at this period of the session he ought not to expect the Senate to do that. I hope, therefore, he will not urge the measure at this time, and will allow the regular order to proceed. In a few hours, I think, the appropriation bill will pass away from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. There is only one word that I desire to say, and that is that my friend forgets that there are some dire necessities connected with the passage of this bill. To-day while we sit here the representatives of a free people, some of the citizen-body that we represent, lie in foreign prisons. Their confederates and associates guilty of the same crime, if any, of which these persons now remaining in prison were guilty, have been discharged because they were native-American citizens, and the others have been detained and kept incarcerated because they were naturalized citizens upon the obnoxious and abominable plea that they were yet foreign subjects. That is all I desire to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on motion of the Senator from California, to postpone the pending and all previous orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. At the proper time I shall be very willing to take into consideration the bill referred to by the honorable Senator from California, but I really think we ought not to let that interfere with the regular progress of the business which is now before us. Let us finish one thing at a time so far as practicable, and then we shall know better where we stand.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, McCreery, Morgan, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Stewart, Tipton, Welch, Whyte, Williams, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Vickers, and Wiley—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cole, Dixon, Grimes, Hendricks, McDonald, Norton, Salisbury, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—14.

Mr. CONNESS. I give notice now that I shall make a similar motion as soon as the Indian appropriation bill shall have been acted upon.

CONFERENCE REPORTS ON PENSION BILLS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask leave to submit nine reports from a committee of conference. They are on pension bills, and I ask that the vote may be taken as it was the other day on a similar occasion, collectively upon them, without reading. They are agreed to fully on both sides, and relate only to pensions.

Mr. POMEROY. The reading can be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks that the reading of the reports be dispensed with. Is there any objection? None being made, the question is on concurring in the reports.

The reports were concurred in. The titles of the bills covered by these reports are as follows:

A bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of Joseph McGhee Cameron and Mary Jane Cameron, minor children of La Fayette Cameron, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 382) granting an increase of pension to Obadiah T. Plum;

A bill (S. No. 422) granting a pension to Maria Schweitzer and the children of Conrad Schweitzer, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 518) granting a pension to the widow and child of John P. Felty;

A bill (S. No. 547) granting a pension to John Sheets;

A bill (S. No. 314) for the relief of George T. Brien;

A bill (S. No. 383) granting a pension to John A. Weed and Elizabeth J. Weed, minor children of Robert T. Weed, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 517) granting a pension to the widow and children of Henry Brown; and

A bill (S. No. 521) granting a pension to the children of William M. Wooten, deceased.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1869.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will resume the reading of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to strike out in line one hundred and forty, in the appropriation for the Chasta, Scoton, and Umpqua Indians, after the word "four," "$700," and to insert "$1,000;" so that the clause will read:

For fourteenth of fifteen installments, for the pay of a farmer, per fifth article treaty 18th November 1854, $1,000.

Mr. HOWE. This is a small amendment; but it is the representative of a great many which, in the aggregate, amount to a very large sum. All through this bill there are items of appropriation for the payment of employes among the different Indian tribes, farmers, millers, physicians, teachers, and people of those classes. The compensation of those employes is not fixed by law nor by treaty stipulations; but the obligation to employ them is declared by treaty stipulation or by law. Where the price to be paid is left to the discretion of the Legislature, the House of Representatives has fixed a certain rate of compensation, and, as a general thing, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has agreed to the terms fixed by the House. The Committee on Indian Affairs, as a general thing, propose to raise that rate of compensation. This is the first proposition of the kind. The clause which it is here proposed to amend is one appropriating for a farmer to reside among some Indians on the Pacific. The next clause proposes to raise the sum to be expended for educational purposes. The salary of the farmer is in the House bill put at $700; the amendment proposes to raise it to $1,000. The question for the Senate to determine is whether $700 is enough to pay for a farmer. If the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, knows of any Indian who ever ate bread or meat raised by an Indian farmer he can state the fact. I do not. My understanding is that this sum is paid to a man to cultivate a farm within the Indian territory instead of cultivating one somewhere else. I do not know how the fact is; but I suppose he subsists himself and his family from the earnings of his own labors from the products of his own farming. If that is so, clearly $700 is enough, and it will hire a farmer I suppose in any part of the country.

I call attention to the second amendment now, because having tried to divide the Senate upon these amendments several times yesterday, and the Senate having sustained every one, I only call attention to this now because it introduces a new class of amendments. I propose to divide the Senate upon this new class, and if they sustain the amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs in these particulars, as they have in all former particulars, I shall take that as the sense of the Senate, and I shall not ask to divide the Senate again until some new proposition is introduced. The second amendment, the one next following this, provides for the support of schools. The House bill names $400; the amendment proposes to raise that to $1,200. The difference is considerable. Neither sum is of any importance. If it was really expended for the purpose of educating the Indian children I should think $1,200 was quite little enough; but if the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs can show us that any Indian child has ever had a day's instruction from all the appropriations we have made for this purpose for these tribes he will do it. I have not seen the evidence of it. We have tabular statements of the children attending these schools on different reservations; but I believe there is no evidence that a child ever went to school a day on this reservation. I have not seen any. Under these circumstances I feel obliged to call the attention of the Senate to these amendments. If they sustain them I shall be entirely content; but I think they will take so much additional money out of the Treasury which will do the Indians no good whatever.

Mr. HENDERSON. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin thinks this is but a representative amendment of various amendments submitted by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I apprehend that the Senator does the committee a little injustice when he says that this is an extravagant proposition, and that it is but a representative of others made.

Mr. HOWE. I did not characterize this as an extravagant proposition. I say that it is a difference of opinion between the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations as to what is a reasonable sum. The Committee on Indian Affairs recommend one sum and the Committee on Appropriations another sum, generally that found in the House bill. The question whether it is extravagant or not is a question to be settled by the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I really cannot state whether it is extravagant or not. As I was going to remark, the Senator from Oregon, who is a very valuable member of our committee, was absent during the consideration of this bill, and only made his appearance in the Senate yesterday morning, since the amendments were reported. I therefore do not know whether this amount is too large or not. In reference to all the changes made east of the Rocky mountains, I thought I had some personal knowledge of the wages of laborers and the prices to be paid for the farmers and mechanics under the treaties with the Indians. West of the Rocky mountains I had no knowledge at all; and the valuable services of the member from Oregon not being had upon the committee, of course in making these amendments I had to follow the recommendations of the Indian bureau. I have done so only in those cases west of the Rocky mountains. Now, turning to the treaty under which this appropriation is made, the fifth article is as follows:

"The United States engage that the following provisions for the use and benefit of the Indians residing on the reserve shall be made: an experienced farmer shall be employed to aid and instruct the Indians in agriculture for the term of fifteen years; two blacksmith shops shall be erected at convenient points on the reserve and furnished with tools and necessary stock; two skillful smiths shall be employed for the same for five years; an hospital shall be erected, and proper provision made for medical purposes and care of the sick for ten years; school-houses shall be erected, and qualified teachers employed to instruct the children on the reserve, and books and stationery furnished for fifteen years."

I did not know how many schools there were upon the reserve, and I could not ascertain, because the member from Oregon was not with the committee. What the wages of an experienced farmer are in Oregon I could not know, except from the statement made by the Indian Bureau; but for the benefit of the Senate I will read what they say on this particular amendment.

It must be observed, before we go any further, that the House Committee on Appropriations, in order to economize—which is a very laudable principle, and I agree with it as much as any Senator—saw fit to cut down the Indian appropriations to almost one half of what they have been heretofore. Whether it is good policy just at this moment to cut these appropriations down as they have done is a question of course for the consideration of the Senate. It is my opinion that it is bad policy. I think that economy in this direction is the worst economy that could possibly be exercised. I think that we ought to carry out faithfully our treaty stipulations with the Indians and maintain peace with them, if we possibly can. All over the country, here in the Senate, and in the other House, there is very great complaint about the expenses of the War Department. It ought to be considered by members of the Senate that from fifteen to twenty millions of the expenses of the War Department annually arise from this question of Indian affairs. Now, would it not be better to save that fifteen or twenty millions by even making an appropriation of $1,000,000 more than we ordinarily do for the Indians? I believe $500,000 judiciously expended would accomplish the purposes better, and save this fifteen or twenty millions. It would be better to make an appropriation to the Indian Bureau of $500,000 or $1,000,000 than to go on as we have done and make large expenditures in another direction. However, it is a matter in which I have no more interest than other Senators.

Now, I will read what the Department say in reference to this matter, and I was guided alone by that:

"Fifth article treaty with Chastas, Scotons, and Umpquas. For pay of farmer, $1,000, reduced to $700; deficiency, $300."—Vol. 10, p. 1123.

That refers to the fifth article, which I have just read:

"The amount in estimate is the same as has been appropriated for years, and considering the cost of living in Oregon, and that everything is upon a gold basis, it would seem that $1,000 is but a reasonable sum for the services of a good farmer."

Of that the Senators from Oregon, who are present, can speak. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORBETT] was not present in committee, and I could not consult him; but I put it at $1,000, the amount appropriated ever since the treaty was ratified. If it is too much, the Senate can cut it down. I thought it was large; but I have followed the recommendations, west of the Rocky mountains, of the Indian Bureau.

The next item is one that I would not have reduced one cent. In regard to that the Department says:

"The item for pay of teachers, purchase of books and stationery, per same article and treaty, is also reduced from $1,200 to $400; deficiency of $800. It must be apparent to all that no teacher can be employed for the amount embraced in the bill. The sum asked for in estimate has been appropriated for years, and it has not been found too large for the purpose."

The Senator asked me if there was any school on this reservation. He says that if any Indian child has ever been educated there it is more than he knows. The Indian Bureau reports say that ever since the ratification of this treaty this appropriation of $1,200 has been made, and it has been expended in keeping up schools on this reservation, and it has not been found to be too large. If they have thus stated falsely, of course we cannot rely upon them for anything. They say such an appropriation has been made and they have used it for years since this treaty was ratified.

Now, Mr. President, if there are any schools there, this is the best appropriation that can possibly be made. The difficulty with the Indian is that he speaks another language. The difficulty of his civilization consists in the fact that we cannot approach him. If we can educate the children, the whole difficulty is gone; it has passed away; and the civilization of the barbarous Indian tribes will have been accomplished. There is no reasonable amount of money that I would not appropriate in order to accomplish this purpose.

So far from the Senator being correct on this subject, I understand that two teachers are employed on this reservation. The Senator from Oregon can correct me if I am in error. It must be remembered that not only are the teachers to be employed, but books have to be purchased and sent into an interior reservation in Oregon. It seems to me that $1,200 is a very small sum for such a purpose. How many teachers can the Senator from Wisconsin employ in the State of Wisconsin, where teachers ought to be numerous, from the intelligence of the Senators sent from that State, with $400, and how many books can he furnish to common schools for this amount of $400? Why, sir, if any appropriation is needed we need more than $400. If any single teacher is to be employed, we need more than that. The Senator can see that for himself. It is idle to say that the appropriation in the bill is sufficient.

The Senator asks me if I ever saw any Indians fed by corn grown by Indians. I can state to him that I have seen a thousand acres of as fine corn as I ever saw cultivated by Indians alone in one field. Why, sir, they are progressing very rapidly in the cultivation of the soil upon the Missouri river.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not ask if he had ever seen any Indians fed by corn grown by Indians. I asked him if he had ever seen Indians fed on corn raised by Indian farmers.

Mr. HENDERSON. Assuredly I have.

Mr. HOWE. White Indian farmers?

Mr. HENDERSON. We have Indian farmers to superintend and to instruct them in the cultivation of the soil, and those farmers that we have sent the Indians on the Missouri river have succeeded in instructing them until they are now almost self-sustaining. Last year the Indians on the Missouri river—I mean the Yanton Indians, and some of the Brulé Sioux—would have been self-sustaining but for the fact that their crops were destroyed by grasshoppers. The Senator is sadly mistaken if he supposes that these very Indians we are now speaking of, the Chastas of Oregon, are not, many of them, good farmers. Many Indians in Minnesota—the Senator from Minnesota can correct me if I am in error—are good farmers, and have succeeded admirably in cultivating the soil. This is a proper appropriation if it is a reasonable one. If it is an unreasonable one the Senators from Oregon can correct it or let it be defeated. I do not want anything but what is right.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to state that this appropriation of $1,000 is not more than sufficient to pay for the services of a good, capable farmer to superintend farming in Oregon. That will be, on the gold basis, about seven hundred and twenty dollars a year, and we cannot employ a good farmer for less than that. I have been upon this reservation. The agent under whom these Indians are, Mr. Simpson, is one of the most capable men that I have ever seen in the conduct of an Indian agency. Upon his agency, the Alsea agency, which he superintends, and the Siletz agency, they raised twenty thousand bushels of potatoes last year or the year before. I went on the reservation last summer in order to ascertain for myself the condition of Indian affairs in that State. I saw there large fields of potatoes; large fields of oats, rye, peas, and barley, that the Indians were cultivating, and that showed thrift, and showed that they were making progress in the art of farming. I went also and examined their school, where they had a good, capable teacher, in my opinion, a man who was formerly a soldier, well qualified and intelligent, and the Indians who were attending school there read well, spelled well, and wrote well. They wrote upon the black-board for me; and they appeared to be possessed of general knowledge. They could talk good English; could tell who the President of the United States was, who the Senators were, members of Congress, &c.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to know whether they could tell who is to be the President of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. CORBETT. I presume they can by this time. [Laughter.] Their agent is a good Union man, and I have just received a letter from him in which he says that he thinks we can carry the State for Grant. [Laughter.] In my opinion, a teacher cannot be employed and books furnished for a less sum than $1,200.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator tell me where it was he found these schools?

Mr. CORBETT. I found this school at the Siletz agency. I believe these Indians are gathered together both upon the Alsea and Siletz agencies under the superintendence of Mr. Simpson and a sub-agent, but he has a general superintendence of the whole.

Mr. HOWE. But this amendment refers to the Chastas, Seeton, and Umpqua Indians.

Mr. CORBETT. Yes, sir; they are combined. There is no appropriation for schools for some of these tribes, and they have been obliged to combine them in order to furnish schools for a number. They not only apply to those tribes, but to others. Where there has been an appropriation of money for school purposes for one tribe and there has been no appropriation for some other tribes they have allowed their children to attend those schools.

I will state to the Senator the situation of the Indians upon this reservation. There was a treaty made with these Indians combined of various tribes, some eight or ten, that are collected upon this coast reservation, to place them upon this reservation, and they were to receive a large amount of money. They have been supported annually, and an appropriation has been made for a school and school purposes, and for the general pay of teachers and support of employes. There is an amendment here that provides an appropriation of $50,000 to be expended for the sustenance and support of the Indians with whom there are no treaty stipulations, and for the support of employes. That treaty was made in 1855 by General Palmer, but was never ratified. They were to receive a large amount of money under those treaty stipulations, but the Senate refused to ratify it; and it has been customary to appropriate $50,000 for the Indians in Washington Territory and Oregon. It is divided, $25,000 to Oregon and $25,000 to Washington Territory. There are some eight or ten tribes of Indians on this reservation, and they are supported by that $25,000 a year. It amounts to about ten dollars per head. The Indians on this reservation are supported cheaper than the Indians upon any other reservation that I know of. They raise all they want in the way of wheat, and very near everything. They are in need of some stock of various kinds, oxen and horses to plow their lands. They were formerly a fishing tribe, and were not engaged in agricultural pursuits; but they have been gathered together, and we have been obliged to supply them with agricultural implements and with oxen and horses; but they are still very destitute of those. I think if the Senator from Wisconsin understood this matter, if he had been upon this reservation and seen just how the Indians are situated, the way they are treated, and the progress they are making, he would not object to this appropriation. They certainly cannot employ a farmer for $700 a year, which would be about four hundred and ninety or five hundred dollars in gold, nor can they employ a teacher for less than from fifty to seventy-five dollars a month in gold. A teacher as competent as the man I saw there would get at least from sixty to seventy-five dollars a month in gold in our public schools.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator a question; I only want information. Does he know the farmer who resides among these Chasta Indians?

Mr. CORBETT. I have been there and seen the farmer upon this reservation who superintends the whole of the reservation.

Mr. HOWE. Does he cultivate a farm himself?

Mr. CORBETT. No, sir; I think not. The farms are laid out for the Indians. Each Indian has a house situated upon a certain piece of ground that is adjacent to his farm. They cultivate in large fields, which are fenced in, and the ground staked off in such a manner as to designate what Indian owns a certain part of the ground. They plow it with a common team belonging to the agency, and the farmer superintends the whole work. The Indians work each upon his own farm. I did not see them at work, but I saw their fields laid out there.

Mr. HOWE. But the question is, whether the farmer cultivates a farm of his own for himself?

Mr. CORBETT. I do not think he does. I did not see any farm belonging to the agent. I saw a house and a garden of about two acres, perhaps; that was all.

Mr. HOWE. Was there any farming land adjacent to it?

Mr. CORBETT. Yes, sir; but it belonged to the Indians. Off on the flat below is a fine farm laid out, as I said, planted in potatoes, where they raised twenty thousand bushels last year. Large potatoe-houses or cellars are built in the banks along, and they are put in there, and they are used in common during the winter for the Indians. They also take them on their backs down to Yaquina bay and sell them to the boats that come in there, small schooners, and a portion of them go to California. They export some potatoes. They have not got teams to take them to market, and so they take them on their backs some four or five miles. I have been to the place where they sell them.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the Senator whether heretofore the farmer has been paid $1,000 or $700?

Mr. CORBETT. One thousand dollars. That is the recommendation of the Department; and I understand that that has been the usual salary. It was cut down in the House without any reason, in my opinion. I do not see any reason for cutting it down. It is the usual appropriation.

Mr. HOWE. Either the Senator from Oregon or myself is talking about different tribes, or else there is a great deficiency in the reports made from these tribes. He speaks of a very advanced state of civilization among the Indians on this reservation. We looked in the reports made to the Department the other evening, and we could not find the return of a single child receiving an education on this reservation among these Indians.

Mr. CORBETT. This reservation, I will state to the Senator, is one hundred miles long, with the exception of twenty-five miles that have been lately opened by an executive proclamation, which contains what is called the Yaquina bay. The reservation has thus been cut in two, and they have been obliged to put a sub-agent upon that portion lying south, and the portion lying north is under the supervision of the agent. I understand that there are two school-houses. There is this one that I visited and saw with my own eyes. I know that this agent is a very competent man, and is working to advance the civilization of the Indians. He is said to be the best Indian agent on the coast.

Mr. HOWE. I am not disposed to raise any question upon the correctness of the report made by the Senator from Oregon. It is a much more flattering one than the official reports made to the Department that I have seen. I supposed that the way this farmer was instructing the Indians was by carrying on a farm himself.

Mr. CORBETT. Oh, no; that is not so.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator says no. A report was read—I examined the report myself—the other evening, by the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, showing amount of produce of different kinds raised by the farmer with the help, as I understood it, of five white employes. I supposed he was carrying on a farm for himself, and employing this labor for his own advantage. I take it, he is not employing this labor to help him in the work of instruction. I supposed he was carrying on a sort of model farm there.

Mr. CORBETT. No, sir; I will state to the Senator what that means. The five employes refer to the wagon-maker, the sawyer, and the different employes on the agency. There are not five employes for the farm. They employ but one farmer who superintends and the Indians do the work.

Mr. HOWE. The Government pays but one; but if the farmer himself sees fit to employ a dozen laborers under him he can do so undoubtedly. He is there for the purpose of instruction, and if he attends to that part of it he discharges all the duty that the law imposes on him.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not know under what appropriation he could pay for five persons.

Mr. HOWE. He could pay them out of his own pocket, and he could recompense himself out of their earnings, if they could earn enough. I do not know whether he would find it profitable or not. That is the way the report was read to me; and so I was inclined to think that this appropriation was to enable a farmer to work for himself mainly, and carry on the work of instruction at the same time. If I have been led into an error; it is from misunderstanding the official reports, and so in reference to the schools. It is a very singular fact that there should be such a flourishing school there, and no report of it made to the Department.

Mr. CORBETT. I will state to the Senator that there may be some under-farmers there. It is eight miles from where the agent is to the saw-mill, and there is a nice, fine piece of prairie land that they cultivate and where these farms are laid out. Five miles distant in another direction from the agency there is another farm laid out, and there may be some subordinate farmers who superintend those different places. I am not positive about that; but I think there was one place some eight miles distant where there was one subordinate farmer, perhaps, who superintended the Indians on that prairie land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was in lines one hundred and forty-three and one hundred and forty-four to strike out "$400" and insert "$1,200;" so that the clause will read:

For fourteenth of fifteen installments for pay of teachers and purchase of books and stationery, per fifth article treaty 13th November, 1854, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line one hundred and fifty the following:

Chippewas, Menomonees, Winnebagoes, and New York Indians:
For educational purposes, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and eighty-three, to strike out "$3,000" and to insert "$5,762 63;" so that the clause will read:

For insurance, transportation, and necessary cost of delivery of annuities and provisions for Chippewas of Lake Superior, $5,762 63.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment—

Mr. HOWE. I had not ascertained where that last amendment came in. That presents a new question on which I wish to get the views of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It raises the question whether when the Government stipulates in a treaty to furnish to a tribe of Indians and deliver a certain amount of goods, the Government is to pay the cost of transportation in addition to the value of the goods; whether when the Government stipulates to deliver to a certain tribe of Indians $100,000 worth of goods, they are to buy those goods in Europe or in New York, and spend $100,000 in the place of first production and pay the cost of transportation in addition? That is the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Wisconsin submits a question that the Senate is just as able to judge of as I am. I do not recollect the wording of this particular treaty in reference to that matter. I can refer to it if the Senator desires it. But the question he submits is one that runs clear through the bill, and has been presented in every Indian appropriation bill since the origin of the Government. Treaties sometimes provide for furnishing annuities for the Indians in money, so much money to be expended by the President of the United States in such manner as he may see fit; sometimes the treaty says for provisions and clothing, &c.; sometimes the articles are specified, sometimes they are not; but the amount in money is generally specified in the treaty; and then if it is to be otherwise delivered than in money the specification is made in the treaty. Now, the Senator from Wisconsin says if a treaty provides for the delivery of a certain amount of money to be expended in goods, should it not be understood to be the cost of the goods at the place of purchase? The usual course, in fact the uniform course of the Government has been to purchase the quantity of articles named in the treaty; that is, to expend the whole amount of money named in the treaty, and then to transport the goods at its own cost to the place of delivery. That is my understanding of the contract. Every lawyer can determine it for himself; I believe that the Senate is generally composed of lawyers. We agree to pay the Indians so much money, and in ordinary cases it is required that it shall be expended in provisions, in articles of clothing, and other articles—the articles are named generally—and to deliver those articles at a certain point. Now, the question is, how are we to get them there? Is it to be at the expense of the Indians or at our own expense? The uniform practice of the Government has been to furnish the transportation at our expense. That has been the interpretation of the contract, and I think it is rather late now to change that interpretation of it.

We have always furnished, as the Senator himself knows, transportation of articles, and in this very case I understand that the transportation is set down at what it was last year. The transportation was obtained as cheaply as it could be last year, and the same sum is set down now to a cent. That is the reason why the cents are put down. The House cut it down, we supposed, without any reason. The goods are to be delivered, as the Senator well knows, because these Indians are in his own neighborhood, at various places in the interior of the State.

Mr. HOWE. What is the amount to be delivered?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is large. For the Chippewas of Lake Superior $5,000 in one place, $8,000 in another, $3,000 in another, $3,000 in another, $5,040 in another, $1,320 in another, $1,060 in another—about twenty-seven thousand dollars in all.

Mr. HOWE. In goods?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir. The Senator will remember that these Indians are at various points scattered all over the State, and that the goods have to be separated and transported by wagons over a large district of interior country. They are not all delivered at the same agency. The Indians are scattered at various agencies.

Mr. HOWE. What are the items of the $27,000?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will see them in the bill from line one hundred and fifty-one to line one hundred and eighty-three. The first item is in money. The next is in goods, household furniture, and cooking utensils.

Mr. HOWE. That is $8,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir. Others are in agricultural implements, cattle, carpenters' and other tools, and building materials, which the Senator will observe will require a vast outlay for transportation in proportion to the quantity furnished. They are to be furnished according to the fourth article of the treaty of September 30, 1854. I understand the amount for transportation is fixed here at the amount we expended last year. If it should be too much the Department certainly ought not to expend it. It may be said, on the other hand, that if we appropriate it the Department will expend it; but good officers ought not to do so. They ought to obtain the transportation just as cheap as they possibly can, and not pay anything more. We ought to give some discretion, of course, to our officers, and if we have bad officers, we ought to try to get rid of them as soon as we possibly can. That is all I recommend. It certainly would be very bad policy to reduce the appropriation for transportation to an amount that will not enable the Department to supply the Indians with goods, unless, on the other hand, we take the view entertained by the Senator, perhaps—I do not know that he entertains it—that the transportation should come out of the amount of the Indian annuities, an interpretation of the contract, as I have before remarked, that has never been given, and I should dislike very much to see it adopted by the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. While we are on this subject I should like to call the attention of the committee and of the Senate to the question of insurance, the appropriation of so much for insurance of transportation. Perhaps the committee have studied that question. I have given it considerable attention in my own affairs, and after a long series of years have come to the conclusion to pay no insurance on anything. I would not pay an insurance for goods on the Missouri river. I transported goods there for a good many years. I would not pay a cent of insurance on my house. I would not pay a cent of insurance on anything. It may be bad financiering, but I believe that any man who can afford to run the risk himself had better run it. I believe that this Government had better insure its own goods than to pay any company for insuring them. This Government of ours could very well afford to do its own insuring. If a company can afford to run, and make money by running our risks, we can run them, if we can afford to own the property.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to suggest to the Senator, with his permission, that if these goods should be lost, there would be an entire failure for that year in furnishing them to the Indians, because there is no other appropriation from which we could supply the Indians for the year, and unless we can get it out of the insurance company they cannot be supplied.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know how it may be on the Missouri river, but in these remote places if goods are lost you cannot collect the insurance in season to get another purchase that year.

Mr. HENDERSON. It has been done.

Mr. POMEROY. There may be instances where it has been done; but as a general rule you cannot do it. I have no amendment to propose on this subject. I only wish to call the attention of the Senate and the committee who represent the department to the fact. I believe that the system of insuring on the part of the Government is unwise. It seems a very strange idea that this great Government of ours should intrust into the hands of a corporation made up of a few individuals its risks and pay them for running them. I am confident it would be good policy, good financiering, good management, and the Government would save money by paying its own risks, by insuring itself. Occasionally there might be something lost; but if these companies can make money and pay from seven to twenty-one per cent., as they do, for taking your risk and mine, and the risk of the Government, I ask why cannot the Government afford to run its own risks and make its own insurance. My own opinion is that the whole subject of insurance is in the interest of the parties who carry on the business, and not in the interests of the community. I have watched this question, and so far as my own affairs are concerned I practice what I teach. I am confident that a man who runs his own risks makes the money. If you allow companies and individuals to run the risk for the Government, they will make money out of the Government, and I protest against their making money out of the Government in this way.

Mr. CORBETT. That would be a very good plan if it did not interfere with our treaty stipulations. Our treaty stipulations provide that a certain amount of money and a certain amount of goods shall be supplied to these Indians annually. As I understand the idea of insuring these goods, it is to insure that the Indians get their goods as stipulated. The great complaint of the Indians is that we do not live up to our treaty stipulations and they do not get their pay promptly. If the Government loses a shipment of goods, they cannot understand why the Government cannot replace them until we assemble in Congress again and make another appropriation; which it is always difficult to obtain for anything that is lost or destroyed. There is always a great contest over such an appropriation. It is very difficult in the first place to get an appropriation, and then to get an appropriation for lost goods is like paying for a dead horse. I presume the Department have adopted the policy of insuring these goods as the only way to secure a prompt fulfillment of our treaty stipulations.

Mr. HOWE. I will only say, not with any hope of defeating the amendment or caring whether it is adopted or not, that the difference between this mode of paying goods and the mode which I suggest is very apparent. We contract to pay the Indians a certain sum, and it is agreed that the sum shall be paid in money or in goods. The theory upon which the Government has practiced is, that they must expend that amount of money in goods somewhere, and wherever they buy them they must pay for transporting them to the Indian reservation, wherever that is. The practical effect is, that instead of spending $100,000, which the treaty calls for, we spend $100,000 and whatever the transportation is in addition. This is a wrong to the Government. The value we got called for just so much money. The duty of the Government was to pay it in money, or, if the Indians desired to have it in goods, they should pay out of that sum the cost of transportation. The Senator says it has been the practice of the Government to deliver the goods, and to deliver the goods at the cost of the Government; and I suspect he is right; but I must say the practice is wrong. I understand that even in cases where it is at the option of the Government to pay a certain sum in money or in goods, the Government has chosen, instead of paying the money without any cost of transportation, to spend the money in goods and pay the cost of transportation. That is a wrong to the Government.

The Senator from Kansas wants to know my opinion on the question of insurance. I have not had any practical experience on that subject. I do not know whether it is better for the Government to insure or not. I do insure myself. I have lost money so far by it, because I have never had any property burnt up that was insured but once.

Mr. POMEROY. I never knew a man but had lost money by it.

Mr. HOWE. If we did not lose money the insurance companies would not make any; that is very certain.

But the Senate is called upon to decide whether this practice is right of paying for this transportation, and if it is right then the Senate is called upon to consider whether the sum mentioned in the bill or whether the sum called for by the amendment is necessary. The amount of goods is to be $12,020 worth, and the bill appropriates $3,000 to transport $12,000, and the amendment calls for over five thousand dollars. The Senator says it is at various points in the interior of Wisconsin. My judgment is that no one point is more than eighty miles from water transportation, and but few of the goods are to be delivered off from water carriage on Lake Superior.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in lines three hundred and sixty-five and three hundred and sixty-six, in the appropriations for the Chippewas in Minnesota, to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800" for the employment of two carpenters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines three hundred and sixty-six and three hundred and sixty-seven, to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800" for the employment of two blacksmiths.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and sixty-seven, to strike out "$2,000" and to insert "$2,400" for four farm laborers. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and sixty-eight, to strike out "$1,000" and to insert "$1,200" for the compensation of a physician.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and sixty-nine, to strike out "$250" and to insert "$500" for the purchase of medicine for the sick.

Mr. HOWE. That raises the question whether $500 worth of medicines is necessary for these Indians in a single year.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was after "1864," in line three hundred and seventy, to strike out "$6,250."

Mr. HENDERSON. That is merely a recapitulation of the various amounts appropriated in the clause, and is entirely unnecessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines three hundred and eighty-five and three hundred and eighty-six, in the appropriations for the Chippewas of the Mississippi, and Pillager, and Lake Winnebagoish bands of Chippewas in Minnesota, to strike out "$400" and insert "$650;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of services and traveling expenses of a board of visitors, to consist of not more than three persons, to attend the annuity payments to the Indians, and to inspect the fields, buildings, mills, and other improvements, as stipulated in the seventh article, treaty May 7, 1864, not exceeding any one year more than twenty days service, at five dollars per day, or more than three hundred miles travel, at ten cents per mile, $650.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line three hundred and eighty-six:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to defray the expenses incident to the removal of the scattering bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota to their reservations, $15,000.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary in addition to the residue of funds already appropriated for the object, to subsidize the scattering bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota for six months after their arrival at their new reservations, $87,398 84.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to erect a new mill at Red Lake for the use of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, $10,000.

For employment of female teachers to teach domestic economy, $1,000.

Mr. HOWE. I must ask for an explanation of that.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is rather an important amendment, and my friend from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] in all probability is more familiar with the circumstances than I am. The amendment is proposed upon his suggestion or the suggestion of his friends in Minnesota. I send to the Clerk's desk the estimates and statement of the Department on this subject. It is a matter that I know but very little about. It is, however, a large appropriation, and is therefore important, and I desire the Senate to understand it thoroughly. Many of the amendments we have acted upon are mere matters of detail and of very little importance, but this is really a substantial matter. I send the documents to the desk, and ask that they be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication of the 18th instant, and accompanying papers, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting an "estimate of appropriations required for the different bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, in removing them to their reservations, and subsisting them for six months after their arrival; also, for the erection of a mill at Red Lake." The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to an early consideration of the subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. BROWNING, Secretary.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copies of a letter from Agent Bassett, dated the 15th instant, setting forth the necessity for removing certain Indians now residing at Otter Tail lake to the reservation at White Earth lake; also of one dated the 6th instant, relative to the removal of some of the Mississippi bands of the Chippewas to their new reservations, stating the cost of such removal and of the subsistence required to feed the Indians for six months after their arrival, and recommending that funds for the purpose be appropriated at once, as the Indians will be removed early in the coming summer.

The appropriation for removing and subsisting the Indians in question, made under the treaty of May 7, 1864, with the Chippewas (see Statutes-at-Large, vol. 13, p. 561) was based upon the supposition that there were eleven hundred Indians to be removed and subsisted for six months after their arrival at their new reservation. It appears from agent Bassett's letter of the 6th instant that seven hundred and thirty-four persons have been removed, and that there are nineteen hundred and sixty-six more to be taken to said reservation. The agent thinks it will cost $15,000 additional to remove those still remaining at their old homes, and $87,398 84 in addition to the amount already appropriated to subsidize them for six months thereafter.

The cost of removing and subsisting the Indians now at Otter Tail lake is embraced in the foregoing amounts. These Indians are a portion of the Pillager band of Chippewas whose reservation is at Leech lake. They have expressed a desire to move to the new reservation belonging to the Mississippi bands at White Earth lake, which the Mississippi Indians—Agent Bassett says—are willing and anxious to have them do. The lands now occupied by them belong to the Government. They are being rapidly settled, and it is a matter of absolute necessity for the Indians to be removed at once or we may expect trouble and difficulty between them and the white settlers.

The amount of funds estimated by Agent Bassett to be necessary to effect the peaceable removal of all these Indians and to subsidize them for six months thereafter may appear large; but if all the bands scattered through Minnesota can be removed from the lands ceded by them to the United States to the reservations provided for them by treaty stipulations, and cared for until such time as they are able to raise a crop, at a cost of not exceeding $102,398 84, the amount estimated by the agent to be necessary, it is the opinion of this office that the result of such removal and the benefits and advantages to be derived therefrom by the white settlers, as well as the avoidance of future troubles with the Indians in that section of the country, would be of far more value and benefit to the country at large than the sum required to accomplish the desired objects.

I inclose herewith an estimate of appropriations required to remove the Indians in question and to subsidize them for six months thereafter; also for the erection of a mill at Red Lake, which, as will be seen by Agent Bassett's letter of the 5th, (copy herewith,) has been totally destroyed by the bursting of the boiler; and, if you concur in the views herein expressed, I respectfully request that the same be laid before Congress for such action as in its wisdom may be deemed proper and just.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

WASHINGTON, March 5, 1868.

SIR: Referring to our conversation this day in relation to a mill at Red Lake, I would say that the mill which was built at Red Lake has been totally destroyed by the bursting of the boiler, and that the Indians are very desirous to have another built for them. They have raised this year from six to seven thousand bushels of corn, besides a good quantity of potatoes and other vegetables. The only use they can make of the corn is to boil it, which they are forced to do. The remoteness and almost inaccessibility of their location renders it very difficult to keep a steam mill in repair. I have examined a stream that flows into the lake at their settlement and find a good mill site for a water-mill. I would therefore recommend that an appropriation be made for the purpose of building them a mill at the place above referred to. I think that with an appropriation of $10,000 I can build them a good saw-mill and grist-mill that will answer their purposes for years to come. Such a mill could be kept in repair by the employees, and would always be ready to do their work. The mill that they have had there has been of but very little use to them, having been out of repair most of the time.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. B. BASSETT,

United States Indian Agent.

Hon. N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

WASHINGTON, March 5, 1868.

SIR: Referring to our conversation this day, I would say that in relation to the Indians who live at Otter Tail lake, in Otter Tail county, State of Minnesota, they are a part of the Pillager bands, and number from four to five hundred; that they have always lived there, that county being a part of the country ceded by the Pillagers to the United States, those Indians never having been removed. The country is rapidly being settled by the whites, and the Indians are a great annoyance to them, numerous complaints having been made to me by the settlers and threats of open hostilities unless the Indians are removed. I have consulted the Indians, and they expressed a desire to move to the new reservation at White Earth lake if they could be treated as the Mississippi Indians were. The Mississippi Indians are willing and anxious to have them go with them. I would therefore respectfully request that I be directed to remove said Indians in accordance with their wishes to said reservation. My opinion is that unless they are removed the Government will be forced to send a military force there to keep peace between them and the settlers.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. B. BASSETT,

United States Indian Agent.

Hon. N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1868.

SIR: Referring to your letter of instructions of August, 1867, I find that additional appropriations will be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty of May 7, 1864, and February 9, 1865. Article twelve of said treaty provides that the Government of the United States shall provide the said Indians with transportation and subsistence to their new homes, and subsistence thereafter for six months.

In pursuance of your instructions I have removed seven hundred and thirty-four of said Indians to their new reservations, and they are being subsisted in accordance with your instructions and the treaty stipulations.

The appropriation heretofore made was for the removal and subsistence of eleven hundred Indians. There are of the Mississippi bands about twenty-one hundred, and of the Otter Tail bands about five hundred, making in all twenty-six hundred; from which amount deduct seven hundred and thirty-four already removed, and it will leave nineteen hundred and sixty-six still to be removed. The estimate for the removal was ten dollars per capita, which sum is as small an amount as it can be done for, and the contract for subsistence is $34 37 per ration per day. The whole sum necessary for the removal, including the Otter Tail bands, will be $26,000; from which deduct the amount already appropriated, ($11,000,) and it will leave a deficiency of $15,000. The subsistence of the aforesaid Indians upon their new reservations at the contract price will amount to the sum of $162,638 84; from which deduct the amount already appropriated, ($75,240,) and it will leave a deficiency of $87,398 84 to be provided for.

I respectfully recommend that the above amounts may be appropriated, as the Indians will be removed early in the present summer. I would also earnestly recommend that the sum of $10,000 be appropriated to build a mill for the Red Lake Indians, the reasons of which are set forth in my letter of the 5th instant.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. B. BASSETT,

United States Indian Agent.

Hon. N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has called upon me to explain more particularly than he is prepared just now to do the merits of this amendment. The Chippewa Indians are located in the northern part of the State of Minnesota. They were once the occupants of about the northern half of that State, the rest of it being owned by the Sioux Indians, their mortal enemies. In the older treaties made with the Chippewas they were recognized as distinct organizations, one branch called the Mississippi bands, of which Hole-in-the-day, who has recently been assassinated, was the head chief; and the other branch, called the Pillager Indians, from some pillage they committed on property in the early days in the history of that country, and they have ever since been called the Pillager bands, who live about Red Lake. These are the Indians referred to in this amendment. The amendment is to carry out the treaty stipulations with these Indians. The Indians, in several treaties made with them within the last three or four years, have agreed to remove from their old reservations, which are very numerous, there being some half a dozen reservations provided for them scattered over the State. It became important to absorb them in the increasing settlement of the country by the whites. The contact with the whites is in many cases demoralizing the Indians. On one reservation especially, that which is called Mille Lac, the lumbermen are about there in numbers. These lumbermen are from Maine, I will say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I do not suppose they are any worse than those from any other State; but, nevertheless, the Indians have become very much demoralized from communication with these lumbermen at Mille Lac. It is thought desirable by the department here that they shall be removed. There are two or three other such reservations where the whites are crowding around and interfering with the proper administration of Indian affairs by the department. It has been thought advisable to remove the Indians to a new reservation further away from the whites, the White Earth Lake reservation, near to the Red river, in the northwestern part of Minnesota, and to extend the reservation west of Leech Lake. Their old reservations are to be surrendered to the Government, and a new reservation provided for them. It was provided heretofore in the treaties that these Indians should be removed.

Mr. POMEROY. Have we appropriated money for the removal?

Mr. RAMSEY. No; you are called on to do it now.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota if these Indians have agreed to remove?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes; in their treaties they agreed to remove.

Mr. HARLAN. I think these Indians have agreed to remove at some time, and when they do make up their minds to start the Government is under obligations to pay the necessary transportation and subsistence for six months.

Mr. RAMSEY. On account of the demoralization of these Indians where they are in the southern and eastern part of the State, by their contact with white settlers, it has been thought advisable to remove them, and they have now entered into a treaty to remove. They have been called on for several years to remove, but there have been influences surrounding them, petty traders and so on, those who make money by them, and enjoy this kind of demoralization, to persuade the Indians to continue on their old reservation. This is not the object of the Government or of the friends of the Indians. The Government wishes to get them away to their new homes. I know the Indians feel indisposed to go, and representations are got up that they are forced away; but they do not know their own condition, they do not know the circumstances that surround them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With whom does it rest by the treaty?

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Minnesota and I do not understand the treaty in the same way, if these are the Indians I am thinking of. We persuaded them to make a treaty giving up their old reservations and stipulating that they might remain on their old reservations as long as they chose; and when they finally decided to go—

Mr. RAMSEY. I had better correct the Senator just there. There is no such provision that they shall remain on the reservation as long as they please.

Mr. HARLAN. Not in so many words; but when they do agree to go, the Government consents to pay their transportation and their subsistence for six months, I think. Some one or two of these bands did agree to go a year or two since, amounting perhaps to six or seven hundred, and have been relocated. The point I was speaking of was whether this appropriation was made with a view to coerce the removal of the rest. If it is made with a view of coercing their removal, it can be done very readily, for men can go to the Indians and say, "Your Great Father now has provided you money to subsist you six months on this new reservation; he expects you to go there;" and they will understand that it means that they are compelled to go; that if they refuse the cavalry will be sent after them and they will be forced to go. The point on which I wish to have information is whether these Indians have voluntarily agreed to go to this new reservation. If they have the appropriation ought to be made; but if it is intended to coerce their removal by means of this appropriation I doubt very much whether it ought to be made.

Mr. RAMSEY. Does the Senator mean to say that the Indians should be allowed to remain with these malign influences operating upon them until the Indians themselves consent to go? They would remain until the last remnant of them was swept off by disease.

Mr. HARLAN. I think they have reserved the right to remain on their old lands until they are ready to go. That is my impression.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator is mistaken. An agreement was made with these Indians, as is generally made with Indians, for the sale of their old reservation, it being deemed important that they should be removed. The Indians cannot comprehend the thing. They themselves desire to remain in their old homes. There are influences surrounding them there, small traders and others who desire to keep them there, and yet the interests of the Indians, which the Government recognize, require the removal. They should be removed. The Government feel the propriety of it, and hence purchased their old reservations and desire to get them away. There are, however, small traders, probably some of them might be properly denominated whisky traders, men who make money out of these Indians, who desire them to remain where they are.

For several years their removal has been resisted under these influences which the Senator can appreciate, and they still persist in keeping them there. It is for their interest they should be removed. The stipulation of the treaty was that they should not be removed until the interests of the Government required it. Now the interests of the Government require that they should be removed. It is a fine country, a timber country. The woodchoppers and lumbermen are down there, and their influence upon these Indians the Senator from Iowa can very well appreciate. The Government desires them to be removed; but there are traders who are stimulating them to apply here to their friends and the Government authorities to ask a little continuance, and they are doing all that they can to remain where they are. It is proper that they should be removed. Their country has been purchased by us and a new and better reservation provided for them. They are under obligation to go. The Government is providing for them, putting up mills and breaking ground at their new reservation, and it would be a gross wrong to allow them to remain where they are.

Mr. HOWE. I believe it was stipulated that these Indians should be removed, and that they should be subsisted six months. The Government was called on to appropriate the money for removing them and for subsisting them, and did appropriate it, and I suppose came to the conclusion that the work was done; but it seems now that it was not done, although the money was expended; that there are more Indians to be removed and more to be subsisted, and more money to be required than there was in the first instance. My great objection to making this appropriation now is that from our past experience it seems that the more money we appropriate the more work we have to do in this direction. I think, therefore, the only safe way is to stop now.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is a very easy way of getting rid of a solemn treaty. You have not done what you promised to do, and all that this amendment does is to make an appropriation to enable the Government to meet its obligations under this treaty. Some of the Indians have been removed; the Indians that you have not yet removed you are under obligations to remove, and you are now simply called on to make an appropriation for the purpose. This is the provision of the treaty to which the Senator from Iowa referred:

"It shall not be obligatory upon the Indians, parties to this treaty, to remove from their present reservation until the United States shall have first complied with the stipulations of articles four and six of this treaty, when the United States shall furnish them with all necessary transportation and subsistence to their new homes, and subsistence for six months thereafter."

"Provided, That owing to the heretofore good conduct of the Mille Lac Indians they shall not be compelled to remove so long as they shall not in any way interfere with or in any manner molest the persons or property of the whites."

The country occupied by these Indians is being settled up by the whites, who protest against their remaining there. The Governor of the State and the Legislature of the State have been for years pressing the removal of these Indians. There is every reason why they should be removed. It is for their interest, the interest of the whites, and the interest of the Government. All these appropriations are appropriations contemplated by these treaties, which the Government cannot in good faith deny. I have reference now to the two items, the $15,000 and the balance for the removal of the Indians on Otter Tail Lake. At Otter Tail Lake there are some six hundred Pillagers. It is a beautiful country, with a very rich soil. That is a large and beautiful lake. Settlers have gone in there in great numbers, and have occupied the country, but these Indians persist in remaining on the borders of the lake in the midst of these white settlements. The Government has no means to remove them, and I think we ought not to hesitate a moment in making an appropriation to furnish the means to remove them to their reservations.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator ought not to accuse us of being regardless of our treaty obligations. We met the obligation of the treaty; we made the appropriation required to carry it out, and I never heard of any deficiency in that appropriation. We supposed the work was done. Some years after that appropriation was made it is said that the work was not done, and we are told that more money is required to do it now than there was then. Of course, at that rate of experience, it is manifest that there is not money enough to execute the treaty. It seems to me good sense dictates that we should withhold this appropriation until the Indians ask us to remove them, and when the Indians ask us to remove them we shall be at liberty to ask them why they did not go when we made the former appropriation. But, sir, it is only a little over one hundred thousand dollars that is involved in this appropriation. I do not think it makes any particular difference whether the amendment is agreed to or not. I suppose there is money enough.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator seems to be very indifferent to the obligations of a solemn treaty made with these Indians, and ratified by the Senate. You have agreed to remove these Indians; they have a right to expect it, and the whites of that vicinity have a right to expect it. You have not appropriated money to do it, and you are now simply called upon to do that. I should think the propriety of the Government fulfilling its solemn obligations would be manifest. This removal is to be made by the officers of the Government, not by the Indians or the white people.

The question being put on the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 12, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest that the amendment be passed over for the present, that we may make a further investigation. I confess that it is not a question with which I am very familiar. There has been a division of these bands of Indians, and it is a troublesome question. I would rather have more time to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last vote having disclosed the want of a quorum, business cannot be proceeded with until the presence of a quorum is ascertained.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no doubt a quorum is present, as will be ascertained if the vote is taken again.

Mr. HOWE. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RAMSEY. Now, I wish the Senate to understand this matter before they vote. This is not an amendment moved by me; it is an amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, who understand this subject entirely. The removal of these Indians has been provided for by treaty, and we ought not to hesitate a moment in making the necessary appropriation for their removal. Congress has appropriated a small sum—a deficient sum heretofore. A part of the Indians have been removed, and we are under obligations to remove the rest; and this amendment is to appropriate a sum sufficient to do it. It ought to be done for the interest of the Indians and of the whites in that region, as well as to carry out the treaty stipulations.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Deolittle, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Thayer, Vickers, and Williams—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howe, McGreevy, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Stewart, Sumner, Whyte, and Wilson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Dixon, Drake, Edwards, Fessenden, Grimes, Harlan, Morton, Norton, Pomeroy, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Wiley, and Yates—23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$3,900," in line four hundred and twelve.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line four hundred and thirty-one to insert:

To replace the sum taken from the Chickasaws for expenses incident to the negotiation of a treaty by order of the Government, $13,820 50.

For goods for Chickasaws, act of February 25, 1799, $3,000.

Mr. HOWE. I must ask the Senator from Missouri for an explanation of that amendment. I believe the first item is not estimated for.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir, it is. The Senator will find on page 157 of the estimates:

"For this amount, to replace the sum of $13,820 50, taken from the funds of the Chickasaw nation for expenses incurred by the Chickasaw delegation in visiting Washington city in 1866, by order of the Government, for the purpose of negotiating a treaty, $13,820 50."

These Indians are notified to send their delegates to Washington for the purpose of effecting an amended treaty, and they appeared here by their representatives in 1866; and this was the cost and expense attending that delegation of Indians to Washington when that treaty was made. It is not necessary for me to refer to the provisions of the treaty made at that time. There are no fund out of which the expenses of the Indian delegation attending Washington could be paid, and the money was paid out of the funds of the Indians themselves, and this appropriation is to replace that amount. These are the only circumstances connected with it.

Mr. HOWE. When was it?

Mr. HENDERSON. In 1866. The Senate will find in the books now the treaty, rather a favorable treaty, made with the Indians at that time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line four hundred and thirty-six, among the appropriations for the Choctaws:

For permanent annuity for support of eight horsemen, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line four hundred and fifty-eight:

To replace the sum taken from funds belonging to Choctaws for expenses incident to the negotiation of a treaty, by order of the United States Government, $7,308 05.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for pay of commissioners appointed under the forty-ninth and fiftieth article of treaty of April 28, 1866, with Choctaws and Chickasaws, $1,538 47.

Mr. HARLAN. I did not understand the explanation given by the chairman of the committee when the kindred amendment was pending, and I will inquire whether in the treaty made in 1866 the Government agreed to pay the expenses incurred by the Indian delegates?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is my recollection; but we can refer to the treaty. I am sure such is the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and sixty-eight, to increase from $2,400 to $3,500 the appropriation for ninth of fifteen installments for pay and subsistence of farmers, blacksmiths, &c., for the confederated tribes and bands of Indians in Middle Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and seventy-three, to increase from $3,600 to $5,600 the appropriation for ninth of twenty installments for pay and subsistence of a physician, sawyer, miller, &c., for these Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line five hundred and forty-six:

To defray the expenses of removing certain disaffected Creek Indians now living in the Cherokee country, and also certain refugees of the same tribe now on the Red river, to their old homes in the Creek country, and to supply them with the necessities of life until such a time as they shall be able to raise crops for their own support, $8,000.

For expenses of taking a census, and investigating the claims of loyal Creeks, refugees, and freedmen, as per article four, treaty of June 14, 1866, $2,000.

Mr. HARLAN. I should like to have an explanation of the first part of that amendment:

To defray the expenses of removing certain disaffected Creek Indians now living in the Cherokee country, and also certain refugees of the same tribe now on the Red river to their old homes in the Creek country, and to supply them with the necessities of life.

The Cherokee and Creek countries lie right by the side of each other. So far as that portion of them are concerned, I think they could move themselves across the line without any expense to the Government. I do not know whether we are under any treaty obligations to support them or not. If not, I am inclined to think that item ought to be stricken out of the amendment. In order to raise the question directly, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the first paragraph.

Mr. HOWE. The question should be put on that first. That was the understanding between the Senator from Missouri and myself. I do not propose to make any objection to the last clause, but the first one I am not agreed to by any manner of means. I think we should vote on that clause separately.

Mr. HARLAN. I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin and withdraw my amendment, and ask a division of the question, so as to have the question taken on the first item first.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will send to the Clerk's desk and have a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs read on that subject, and also the statement of Mr. Wortham, the superintendent of Indian affairs in that superintendency, and also that of Agent Dunn.

The Chief Clerk read the following documents:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 18, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 10th instant, and accompanying papers, relative to certain disaffected and refugee Creek Indians, now living in the Cherokee nation and on Red river.

An estimate is also herewith transmitted of appropriation to defray the expenses of removing said Indians to their old homes in the Creek country, and to supply them with the necessities of life until such time as they shall be able to raise crops for their support.

The attention of Congress is respectfully and very earnestly invited to an early consideration of, and action upon, this case.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary of the Interior.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a letter from Superintendent Wortham, dated the 3d instant, and of one transmitted by the superintendent from Agent Dunn, relative to certain disaffected and refugee Creek Indians now living in the Cherokee nation and on the Red river.

Agent Dunn says that the disaffected Creeks now in the Cherokee country, owing to the want of funds, cannot be removed, and that they should be removed this winter without fail in order that they may settle in their old homes before spring and plant crops for their support during the coming year. He also states that a number of southern Creek refugees are reported on the Red river, destitute and unable to return to their homes, and thinks the sum of $8,000 with proper economy will be sufficient to remove all to their old homes.

The superintendent says these unfortunate and misguided people should at once be restored to their homes, and urgently requests that an appropriation of $10,000 be asked for the purpose of furnishing the Indians in question with transportation to their old homes in the Creek country, and providing them with subsistence until such time as they may be able to raise crops.

The disaffected portion of the Creeks referred to by the superintendent and agent is a small band under the leadership of Spo-ko-ke-gee-ya-hola, who has the idea that the direction of the affairs of the Creek nation properly belongs to him, and that he is the proper person to be chief of the nation. His followers at one time numbered about five hundred; but by repeated efforts of Agent Dunn the number has been reduced to, probably, about two hundred. I inclose herewith a letter from late Superintendent Byers, dated the 9th of April last, transmitting one from the agent, which gives a full and explicit history of this disaffected portion of the tribe.

As regards the number and condition of those on the Red river, I have to say that this office has no other information than that contained in the agent's letter transmitted to this office by Superintendent Wortham on the 3d instant. If there are any destitute Indians at the place named, they should be cared for and removed to their old homes without delay, for the reasons stated by the agent; and for similar reasons, as well as to break up the disaffected clan, the followers of Spo-ko-ke-gee-ya-hola should also be removed, if possible, at the earliest day practicable. It will be necessary, if the removal is made, to supply them with subsistence until they can harvest their crops; and with this inducement I am of the opinion that the agent will be able to prevail upon the disaffected ones to return to their old homes and live in amity with the main portion of their tribe.

Should you concur in the views herein expressed, I respectfully recommend that the matter be laid before Congress for its action; and in order that this may be done, I have caused to be prepared, and inclose herewith, an estimate of appropriation necessary to accomplish the object desired.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. G. TAYLOR,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.
Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter from J. W. Dunn, United States Indian agent for the Creeks, and beg leave to call your attention particularly to that portion relating to the disaffected and refugee Creeks now living in the Cherokee nation and on Red river. Humanity demands for these unfortunate and misguided people that steps be taken at once to restore them to their old homes, and I would respectfully and urgently request that an appropriation of $10,000 be asked for and placed in my hands, the whole, or so much thereof as may be strictly necessary, with judicious management, for the purpose, to be expended in furnishing these refugees with transportation to their old homes in the Creek country, and in providing them with subsistence until such time as they may be able to raise corn and vegetables for their own support.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES WORTHAM,
Superintendent Indian Affairs, Southern Superintendency.
Hon. N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

CREEK AGENCY, INDIAN TERRITORY,
January 1, 1868.

SIR: In making report of the condition of affairs within this agency for the month of December just past, I have to submit the following:

The new constitution and laws adopted by the Creeks in October last are now in full and successful operation. The election of one principal and one second chief provided for, resulted in the election of Samuel Shecote and Micco Hutke to these several positions by a majority as reported of over thirteen hundred! They are now duly installed and recognized as executives.

A meeting of the council is called for this day to determine for what purposes the amount turned over by yourself in the past month shall be used. It is understood that this will be made a fund for the payment of all public debts incurred since the treaty of peace of Fort Smith in 1865.

This sum, amounting to $53,786 05, will be adequate to settle all claims, but the intention is to pay all now that can be paid, and reserve those unsettled for the future.

The weather during the past month has been mild and pleasant until toward its close, when the northers prevailed, and the snow fell in large quantities throughout the country. Their rivers are exceedingly low, and all transportation of goods, usually by water, has been made across the country from the railroads in Missouri or in Kansas.

The disaffected Creeks now located in the Cherokee country remain unswerving. Owing to the withdrawal of authority, and to the want of funds, I am unable now to act favorably to their removal. They should be removed this winter without fail, in order that they may be settled in their old homes before spring, to enable them to plant crops for their own support during the coming year. A tyrannical system, which should be suppressed, seems to prevail there that prevents any one leaving the clan without being exposed to assassination.

By all means funds should be placed at my disposal to enable me to act promptly and effectively. A number of southern Creek refugees are reported still on Red river, destitute and unable to return to their homes. As soon as I am fully informed of their numbers, &c., I will make report thereof for your information. And in the event of an appropriation being asked from Congress for return of northern disaffected Creeks, I would suggest that the expenses of these southern refugees be also authorized. I conceive that the sum of $8,000, with proper economy, will be sufficient to effect the removal of all.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

J. W. DUNN,
United States Indian Agent for Creeks.
JAMES WORTHAM, esq.,
Superintendent Indian Affairs, Washington City.

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT INDIAN AFFAIRS,
FORT SMITH, ARKANSAS, April 9, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to your office a communication from Major J. W. Dunn, United States Indian agent for the Creek Indians, bearing date the 1st April, 1867, received at this office, relative to a small band of the Creeks, who refuse to acknowledge the late treaty made between the United States and the Creek nation.

This small band has given considerable trouble to the agent. I have sent from this office a number of written communications to the chief of this small band, pointing out to him the folly of opposing the late treaty, and that it was the supreme law of the land and would be enforced by the United States, and requesting that he and his band would return to their country and become recipients of the provisions of the treaty and the bounty of the United States.

So far as I can learn, my communications had but little influence upon the chief, and he and such of his band as he can control still refuse to return to their homes, and refuse to acknowledge the binding force of the treaty.

I instructed the agent to use whatever of influence he could to have those people return to their homes and live in peace with their brethren, and I am satisfied the agent has fully discharged his duty in this respect.

I respectfully submit the communication for such consideration as you may deem it requires.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. BYERS,
Superintendent Indian Affairs.
Hon. N. G. TAYLOR,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

CREEK AGENCY, CHEROKEE NATION.

April 1, 1867.

SIR: In compliance with your approval and suggestion, I undertook during the last quarter to effect the removal of the destitute and disaffected Creeks located within the Cherokee country, for reasons that seemed imperative, admitting of no delay. That this subject may be brought clearly to your mind and properly understood through you to the Department, a brief review of the condition of affairs leading to my action in this matter may be necessary.

The Creeks in question are principally Tuckabatches, who were led from the Indian country to a refuge in Kansas by the lamented orator, Opothle-yahola. On the death of the orator, the direction of affairs was left to Spo-ko-ke-gee-ya-hola, who has ever since been led by an idea that the mantle of Opothle-yahola had fallen on his shoulders, and that to him properly the direction of the affairs of the Creek nation belonged. With the exception of his adherents, composed at that time of probably five hundred persons, there were none others of the Creeks who could discern his right or ability to lead the nation in its councils.

An election gave expression to this opinion. But Spo-ko-ke-gee, if he could not be chief of the Creeks, would be chief of his own people, and he accordingly separated himself with his adherents from the majority of the Creeks; and since that time referred to the Spo-ko-ke-gees have endeavored to retain an independence which has amounted to sulksiness, leading them to abstain from all share in the national councils, and to refrain from all that savored of Creek rule or authority. So far did they carry this sulky disposition that when the Creeks, together with these people, (whom for want of a more suitable name we may style Spo-ko-ke-gees), were removed from Kansas to the Indian country the Spo-ko-ke-gees would not condescend to camp upon the same side of the stream with the others. Indeed, it was this feeling that led them to stop short of the Creek country and take up their abode within the Cherokee nation, where, they probably argued, they would at least be free from Creek authority, although entitled to no rights with the Cherokees either in lands or money.

On my return from Washington last summer I noted this condition of affairs, and at once made efforts to bring about a reconciliation; but my way was clogged by fresh difficulties. The Creek delegation with whom I had been engaged in Washington in negotiations with the United States Government, had made a treaty which was made public on their arrival in the nation, and ratified at a general council, to which the Spo-ko-ke-gees were called in common with all the other Creeks. True to their disposition they remained aloof, but took care to learn of the proceedings of the council.

All Indians are opposed to the sale of their lands, for whatever purposes; so that Spo-ko-ke-gee heard that the Creeks had sold one half of their whole domain to the United States, although neither he nor his people would set foot on Creek soil, he felt that he had a newer and stronger hold on them through this action of the Creeks. And he again rallied his people, who were almost faltering in their determination, and resolved that neither he nor they should ever share in the benefits of the treaty or acknowledge it in any way.

The general council of the Creeks repeatedly sent delegates to the Spo-ko-ke-gees to confer with them, and endeavor to lead them back to their own country, and I have also made many unsuccessful efforts to the same end. I had considered that I would at least be able to procure their enrollment, in order that they might share in the per capita payment of $200,000 then due the Creeks; but Spo-ko-ke-gee maintained a stubborn silence; and absolutely refused to permit the taking of the census. Such was the condition of affairs at the close of the last year, 1866.

Early in January, 1867, I was informed by Major Humphreys, United States agent for Cherokees, that his people were greatly dissatisfied with the Creeks remaining among them, and that they insisted on their removal, as they refused to come under Cherokee laws, which they were constantly violating. A general council of the Cherokees has given vent to a protest to this effect, and he, Major Humphreys, was expecting them to call upon the military to effect the removal of these people.

In view of these facts, it seemed to me eminently proper to endeavor to persuade them to remove to their former homes. I was confident that Spo-ko-ke-gee was the directing spirit of the disaffection, that his control was keeping the people from their country; that there were many among them who, from their destitution, would gladly avail themselves of the per capita money could they be enrolled; and that no enrollment would be possible while Spo-ko-ke-gee retained his sway over them; that the only way to sever this control was to bring the people among the less prejudiced of their own nation, and I considered that the time was opportune for this consummation; their destitution argued well for a release therefrom that might be secured by a share in the national money about to be divided; the approach of spring suggested the planting of crops and preparation therefor; the dissatisfaction of the Cherokees indicated that their remaining longer was doubtful, and at least due to the generosity of the people among whom they were thrown; and nearest argument, the coming down of the military might suggest their being driven across the river without transportation and at the cost of all their corn, on which they alone relied for subsistence. And above all I considered that these circumstances made it my duty as their agent to use all endeavors to break up the disaffection and to secure protection to their property. To do this, I considered their removal absolutely necessary. It was impolitic at that time for me to wait authority from Washington, or even from the superintendent. The affair demanded immediate action, on account of the approach of the planting season, the threatened action of the military, and the possibility of an early payment, which once made, would no longer serve as an inducement. I accordingly invited the Spo-ko-ke-gees to meet me in council the 8th day of January, 1867. On that day I met them according to appointment, and made known the true condition of affairs; and as it was impossible for them to arrange for their own removal, I offered to furnish transportation for all those who were unable to assist themselves. My offer was very sulkily received. The people were afraid to speak, and referred everything to the chiefs, from whom I could learn nothing; they preserved a silence more dignified than satisfactory.

During the following week the chief of a little clan called Weah-golp has called on me at the agency, and made known his desire of removing his clan from the Spo-ko-ke-gees to the Creek country. I at once made preparations for their removal, together with all their corn and provisions and cooking utensils, considering these absolutely necessary for their comfort and subsistence. To meet the expenses of this removal, amounting to nearly two hundred dollars, I issued certificates payable on the receipt of money from the Government for this object. These were the only removals made up to the time of your arrival at the agency on your way to the Seminole country, when you, in view of the prospective payment to the Creeks, thought proper to suggest another attempt, which seemed necessary and possible of success. The result of this endeavor was more successful, the people being divided in their intentions. For, the military not having been called down upon them, and the fortunes of the Spo-ko-ke-gees trembling from the influence of the payment, Spo-ko-ke-gee determined to remove further into the Cherokee country with his retainers, and thus preserve his rule. But some could not go, and of these few, some were induced to return to their own country. The expense of this removal, as well as can now be ascertained, will not exceed $400, if it reach that amount, and I have given certificates similar to those issued in the previous removal.

I am confident that if the Government will place sufficient funds in my hands I will be able to break up this clique and restore the same friendly feeling among these people as is constant with all other Creeks, and prevent any disturbance occurring by reason of a misunderstanding between the Cherokees and the Creeks. I do not think that the number of the disaffected can now exceed two hundred, and I very respectfully suggest that authority be granted me to arrange for their removal to their old homes, and that money may be furnished for the same purpose. I would also request that I may be allowed $600 to make good the expenses already incurred, the same to be accounted for by proper vouchers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. DUNN,
United States Indian Agent.
Colonel W. BYERS, Superintendent Indian Affairs,
Fort Smith, Arkansas.

Estimate of appropriation required to defray the expenses of removing certain disaffected and refugee Creek Indians to their old homes in the Creek country.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of removing certain disaffected Creek Indians now living in the Cherokee country, and also certain refugees of the same tribe now on the Red river, to their old homes in the Creek country, and to supply them with the necessities of life until such time as they shall be able to raise crops for their own support, $10,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senate can see from those letters the reasons for the amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I am very clear in my own mind that this appropriation ought not to be made. The Indians, of course, have their political difficulties, just as white people have. It seems from the reading of those papers that one of their leading men has become dissatisfied because he was in a minority, and has sloughed off and taken off a part of the people with him amounting to two or three hundred. These little difficulties are occurring constantly.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will observe that the portion sloughed off under this chief only consists of about two hundred, and are now in the Cherokee country; but there are a large number of others down on the Red river who went off in consequence of the rebellion. Some of them were driven out from among the Creeks and have never returned. They are on the Red river. That is altogether a different band.

Mr. HARLAN. This is occurring constantly. There are Creeks going into the Cherokee country, and Cherokees going into the Creek country, and Seminoles into one or the other, and Choctaws going into the three first named. They are constantly commingling with each other, and if we undertake to compel them to live within the limits of their respective reservations when they choose to go across the lines and live for the time being with their neighbors, we shall undertake a work which can never be accomplished successfully, and will be perfectly fruitless. If this disaffected chief should go back they would drive him away, in all probability. He would go back with the idea that he was to become the principal chief, and would be constantly fomenting difficulties when he arrived at home. I think the proposition will be fruitful of evil rather than good, unless they voluntarily go back. As I understand it, they would be entitled if they go back to their proportion of annuities. The Creeks are not now poor. Since the sale of a part of their large reservation to the United States, they have a very considerable sum of money due them, on which they are receiving interest annually. They are not, therefore, poor Indians. If these people choose to go back to their homes they will have the means of going back. The Indians can travel. That portion of the Indians referred to, the Creek Indians, know how to use their natural means of locomotion. There is no difficulty in their traveling even a few hundred miles without any assistance from anybody but themselves. I do not think this appropriation ought to be made. I think it would be fruitful only of evil if it were made. It would be entering on a system of control of the local affairs of the tribe which would be unending.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will observe that I entertained some of the views he now expresses in preparing the amendment. I did not include in the amendment any expenses whatever for removing that particular band that is now in the Cherokee country that went off of their own accord, but provided for removing back the refugees on the Red river. He will see that I say nothing about the Indians under the charge of this particular chief who went off voluntarily into the Cherokee country. I am disposed to defer very much to the honorable Senator's opinions in reference to these matters. Indeed I should hate very much to run counter to them, for I am satisfied that he is very well acquainted with the whole subject-matter. But my impressions upon an examination of the documents led me to suggest the amendment that is now submitted, confining it entirely to the Red river Indians.

I understand that these refugees dislike very much to return except under the authority of the Government. They are a long distance from home. They went off during the civil war, in which Creeks participated as well as the people of our own country, some taking one side and some the other; and they feel hardly authorized to return home. Those who voluntarily went off can return, but the others do not feel that they would be safe on their return back without some sanction of the Government. There is no doubt they were disloyal Indians. I understand they are committing depredations on the whites in the section of the country where they are. In fact, we have various accounts of depredations committed down on the Red river within the last few months, and it is supposed these Indians are connected with those depredations. They have not been receiving any part of the appropriations belonging to the Creeks, as I am informed, since these political troubles, and it is highly essential that they should be brought back. The agents and the superintendent do not seem to be desirous of attempting to return them without some quasi authority of Congress.

There is another trouble, I understand. The white people are quite hostile to them because they have depredated upon them, and unless they have the authority or sanction of law for their return, they will probably be attacked upon their return home, as they have to pass through white settlements in order to get back. This has been suggested as one reason why a small appropriation should be made. They will have to be subsisted. If not, upon their return they will commit depredations which will cost the Government perhaps in the end much more than this small appropriation.

I suggest to the Senator that if in his judgment it be wrong as it stands, to move to amend it in some shape, either to take it out of the Creek funds or else make a smaller appropriation and attempt to get them back in some way. I am very clearly of the opinion, from an examination of the subject, that something ought to be done to remove them back.

Mr. HARLAN. I would agree to the amendment if amended as the Senator suggests, to strike out that part which refers to the Creeks in the Cherokee country, and let it apply only to those on Red river, and then reduce the appropriation to what amount he may deem necessary. The additional facts which the Senator has stated perhaps ought to control. If they are committing depredations on the white people in the Red river country, that is a reason for bringing them back to their old homes. I therefore move to amend the amendment by striking out all those words that refer to the Creeks in the Cherokee country.

Mr. HENDERSON. Strike out the words "certain disaffected Creek Indians now living in the Cherokee country, and also certain refugees of the same tribe," and insert "certain refugee Creek Indians." That is satisfactory?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then it will read: "To defray the expenses of certain refugee Creek Indians now on the Red river to their old homes in the Creek country, and to supply them with the necessities of life until such time as they shall be able to raise crops for their own support." I do not know that that last clause is necessary, because they will be entitled to a part of the annuities upon their return. However, that will not be objectionable. Do you propose to reduce the amount?

Mr. HARLAN. I think it would be well to strike out $8,000 and insert a smaller sum.

Mr. HENDERSON. Four thousand dollars?

Mr. HARLAN. Four thousand dollars will, perhaps, be sufficient.

Mr. HENDERSON. I accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

To defray the expenses of removing certain refugee Creek Indians now on the Red river, to their old homes in the Creek country, and to supply them with the necessities of life until such a time as they shall be able to raise crops for their own support, $4,000.

Mr. HOWE. I think this is decidedly improved by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa, but I am still opposed to the adoption of the amendment. I shall not argue it. I think the way to send those Indians back is to tell them to go. They are just as capable of going as we are of moving them, and they will go as quick as we tell them.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the second clause of the amendment, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

For expenses of taking a census, and investigating the claims of loyal Creeks, refugees, and freedmen, as per article four treaty of June 14, 1866, $6,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five hundred and eighty-two, in the appropriations for the D'Wamish and other allied tribes in Washington Territory, to strike out "$1,500" and to insert "$3,000," so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the establishment and support of an agricultural and industrial school, and to provide said school with a suitable instructor or instructors, per fourteenth article treaty 22d of January, 1855, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five hundred and eighty-seven, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the establishment and support of a smith and carpenter's shop, and to furnish them with the necessary tools, per fourteenth article treaty 22d January, 1855, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five hundred and ninety-two, to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the employment of a blacksmith, carpenter, farmer, and physician, who shall furnish medicines for the sick, per fourteenth article treaty 22d January, 1855, $4,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six hundred and seven, in the appropriations for the Flatheads and other confederated tribes, to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,800;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for providing suitable instructors therefor, per fifth article treaty 16th July, 1855, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six hundred and twelve, to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for keeping in repair blacksmiths', tin and gunsmiths', carpenters', and wagon and plow-makers' shops, and providing necessary tools therefor, per fifth article treaty 16th July, 1855, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six hundred and seventeen, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$7,400;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the employment of two farmers, two millers, one blacksmith, one tinner, one gunsmith, one carpenter, and one wagon and plow-maker, per fifth article treaty 16th July, 1855, $7,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six hundred and twenty-eight, to strike out "twelve" and insert "fourteen;" so as to make the pay of a physician $1,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six hundred and ninety-nine, in the appropriations for Makah tribe, to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the support of an agricultural and industrial school, and for pay of teachers, per eleventh article treaty 31st January, 1855, $2,500.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and three, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for support of a smith and carpenter's shop, and to provide the necessary tools therefor, per eleventh article treaty 31st January, 1855, $500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared the amendment appeared to be rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot submit to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again, if the Senator desires it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I call attention to the fact that this is under a treaty stipulation:

For ninth of twenty installments for the support of a smith and carpenter's shop, and to provide the necessary tools therefor, per eleventh article treaty 31st January, 1855.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For what tribe, and where?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Makah tribe, in Washington Territory. It is to furnish two shops with all the necessary tools and implements to carry them on. It is an utter impossibility to do that on $300.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I did not understand how the previous amendment was decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. Does the Senator from Missouri consent to that?

Mr. HENDERSON. I made no opposition. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] voted against it.

Mr. CORBETT. I voted for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it ought to remain as proposed to be amended. I call for a division on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to have the question stated again?

Mr. CORBETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. I will ask to have it taken again. I observe that it is for the support of an industrial school, and it occurs to me that $1,500 is not sufficient to support an industrial school.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be stated again.

Mr. HOWE. Let me say a word. The Senator well knows, as I have informed the Senate, that I disagree to the raising of all these appropriations. I believe them to be as unnecessary as fifth wheels to coaches, and I believe them as useless. I have voted steadily against them right along for a page or two, and nobody voted for them; but they have been pronounced carried, which I took as conclusive evidence that I amounted to nothing, being the only vote against them and nobody voting for them. [Laughter.] This one amendment was put, and for some reason or other, the Presiding Officer, the present President not being then in the chair, reversed his ruling. I voted against that, and nobody voted for it, and for a wonder that was declared lost. The Senator from Missouri heard it. He did not call for any division. He acquiesced in the ruling of the Chair at the time.

The Senator from Iowa says that the appropriation in the bill is not sufficient to support an industrial school. During vacation—I cannot leave just at present, at least I cannot leave until this bill is disposed of—but as soon as I am released, I will go up there and keep an industrial school for the amount of money appropriated here. If you want to appropriate more money, vote it. I object to voting it now because it has been disposed of once. There is no motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARLAN. I will move to reconsider the vote on that amendment if the Senator desires us to be perfectly formal in this matter.

Mr. HOWE. I want to be very formal about this.

Mr. HENDERSON. I can tell the Senator that they have the school in operation there. There are three hundred and twenty males and three hundred and sixty females in the tribe, and there are thirteen males and six females in the school.

Mr. HOWE. Is that in the industrial school?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CORBETT. These children have to be supported. We have taken them from their parents, and they are supported and boarded in the school.

Mr. HARLAN. And clothed also.

Mr. CORBETT. And clothed. I should like to know how you can support an industrial school in that country on $1,500 in greenbacks, at seventy cents on the dollar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. How much is the appropriation?

Mr. HENDERSON. I propose to make it $2,500 instead of $1,500. I cannot see how they can get along with $1,500. There are twenty scholars in the school.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to state, also, that I voted for the amendment, but the Chair did not appear to hear my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote on the amendment in line six hundred and ninety-nine, striking out $1,500 and inserting $2,500.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and seven, to strike out "three" and insert "four," so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the employment of a blacksmith, carpenter, farmer, and physician who shall furnish medicines for the sick, per eleventh article treaty 31st January, 1855, $4,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and twenty-three, in the appropriations for the Miamies of Kansas, to strike out "eight" and insert "nine," so that the clause will read:

For permanent provision for blacksmith and assistant, and iron and steel for shop, per fifth article treaty 6th October, 1818, and fourth article treaty June 5, 1854, $940.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be made unless objected to.

Mr. HOWE. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and fifty-eight, in the appropriations for the Mole Indians, to strike out "$1,000" and to insert "$1,500;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of ten installments for keeping in repair saw and flouring mills, and for the pay of necessary employes, the benefits of which to be shared alike by all the confederated bands, per second article treaty 21st December, 1855, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and sixty-four to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of ten installments for the pay of a carpenter and joiner to aid in erecting buildings and making furniture for said Indians, and to furnish tools in said service, per second article treaty 21st December, 1855, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and sixty-eight, to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$3,000;" so that the clause will read:

For pay of teachers to manual labor school, for all necessary materials therefor, and for the subsistence of the pupils, per second article treaty 21st December, 1855, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and seventy-eight, in the appropriations for the Nisqually, Puyallup, and other tribes and bands of Indians, to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$6,700;" so that the clause will read:

For fourteenth of twenty installments for pay of instructor, smith, physician who shall furnish medicine to the sick, carpenter, and farmer, per tenth article treaty 26th December, 1854, $6,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and eighty-four to strike out "eight" and insert "fifteen;" so that the clause will read:

For fourteenth of twenty installments for the support of an agricultural and industrial school, and support of smith and carpenter shop, and providing the necessary tools therefor, in conformity with tenth article of the treaty of December 26, 1854, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred, in the appropriations for the Nez Perce Indians, to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the employment of one superintendent of teaching and two teachers, per fifth article treaty 11th June, 1855, $3,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and ten, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$9,400;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the employment of one superintendent of farming, and two farmers, two millers, two blacksmiths, one tinner, one gunsmith, one carpenter, and one wagon and plow-maker, per fifth article treaty, 11th June, 1855, $9,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and twenty-two, after the word "thousand" to insert "four hundred;" so as to make the pay of a physician for the tribe, $1,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and twenty-six, to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to appropriate $300 for keeping in repair the buildings of employes and providing the necessary furniture therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and fifty-one, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to appropriate $500 to keep the blacksmiths' shops in repair and stocked with the necessary tools and materials.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, after line nine hundred and twelve, the following:

Ottawas:

To replace a sum taken from annuities of Ottawas, &c., $1,250 30.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nine hundred and fifty-three, in the appropriations for the Poncas, to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For last of ten installments for the establishment and maintenance of one or more manual-labor schools, under the direction of the President, per second article treaty 12th March, 1858, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nine hundred and sixty-two, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$7,500;" so that the clause will read:

For last of ten installments, or during the pleasure of the President, to be expended in furnishing said Indians with such aid and assistance in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, including the working of the mill provided for in the first part of this article, as the Secretary of the Interior may consider advantageous and necessary for them, per second article treaty 12th March, 1858, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one thousand and one, in the appropriations for the Pottowatomies, to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For education, during the pleasure of Congress, per third article treaty of October 16, 1828, second article treaty September 20, 1828, and fourth article treaty October 27, 1832, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line one thousand and twenty-one the following:

For this amount, to be charged to the Pottowatomie fund, to enable the President of the United States to carry out the provisions of the third article treaty of November 15, 1861, with the Pottowatomie Indians, as modified by the treaty of March 29, 1866, by paying to those six hundred members of the tribe who have elected to become citizens in accordance with said article, the proportion of the cash value of the Pottowatomie annuities to which they are entitled, $317,655 96, or so much thereof as may be necessary to comply with the provisions of said treaties; of which amount $110,091 74 is hereby appropriated, in coin, as contemplated in treaties of November 15, 1861, and March 29, 1866; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell so much of the stock held by him in trust for said Indians as will realize the sum of $59,779 81, or so much as may be necessary under said treaties, it being the share of the above-mentioned six hundred persons in the bonds belonging to said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and thirty-six, in the appropriations for the Quapaws, after the word "dollars" to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That this sum of $600, together with any unexpended balance heretofore appropriated for the employment of a farmer, may be used in the purchase of such articles of food and clothing as may be thought necessary in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and forty-six, in the appropriations for the Qui-nai-elt and Quil-leh-ute Indians, to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the support of an agricultural and industrial school, and for pay of suitable instructors, per tenth article treaty July 1, 1865, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and fifty, to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for support of smith and carpenter shop, and to provide the necessary tools therefor, per tenth article treaty July 1, 1865, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines ten hundred and fifty-four and ten hundred and fifty-five, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,500;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the employment of a blacksmith, carpenter, and farmer, and a physician, who shall furnish medicines for the sick, per tenth article treaty July 1, 1865, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line ten hundred and ninety-six, in the appropriations for the Seminoles, the following:

To supply a deficiency in appropriation for subsisting Seminole Indians, $31,083 79.

To supply a deficiency in appropriation to pay expenses of commissioners to investigate the losses of loyal Seminole Indians, $2,316 79.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line eleven hundred and three, in the appropriation for the Senecas:

For blacksmith, assistant, shop and tools, $1,060.
For miller, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line eleven hundred and ninety, in the appropriations for the Lower Brulé band of Dakota Sioux:

For the building of a saw-mill, storehouse, and for the pay of engineer and employes, $8,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line twelve hundred and forty-one, in the appropriations for the Two Kettles band of Dakota Sioux:

For the building of a saw-mill, storehouse, and for the pay of engineers and employes, $8,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "dollars," in line twelve hundred and seventy, to insert:

Provided, That in delivering the annuities herein named to the Blackfeet, the Lower Brulé, the Minneconjoux, Ojapapas, Ogallallas, Sans Ares, Two Kettles, Upper Yantonnais, and Yantonnais Sioux, if any persons of the said bands shall be permanently absent, the Secretary may withhold such part of said appropriation as may be the proportionate share of said absent persons. And if such absent persons shall be found to be hostile, or provided for under other treaty stipulations with the Government, the Secretary may use the proportion of the appropriation due to such part of said bands for the benefit of other of said bands by the purchase of stock, provisions, clothing, and agricultural implements.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line twelve hundred and seventy-four:

For furnishing the Sisseton and Wapeton Sioux, at Devil's lake, Dakota Territory, with agricultural and mechanical implements, and provide for their education, as contemplated by the sixth and seventh articles of treaty February 19, 1867, $25,000.

For furnishing the Sisseton and Wapeton Indians, at Lake Traverse, Dakota Territory, under same treaty for the above-named purposes, $50,000, and to pay for provisions and agricultural implements furnished said Indians during the winter of 1867 and 1868, $7,457 25.

For deficiencies in the appropriation made for the Sioux and other Indians, of Dakota, namely: for the nine bands of Sioux, $91 40; for the Arikarees, Gros Ventres, and Mandans, $3,923 68; for the Poncas, $11,900 26; and for the Crows, $3,044 09.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve hundred and eighty-eight, in the appropriations for the S'Klallams, to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the support of an agricultural and industrial school, and for pay for suitable teachers, per eleventh article treaty 26th October, 1865, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve hundred and ninety-four to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,600;" so that the clause will read:

For ninth of twenty installments for the employment of a blacksmith, carpenter, farmer, and a physician, who shall furnish medicines for the sick, per eleventh article treaty 26th October, 1865, $4,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and sixteen, in the appropriations for the Tabeguache band of Utah Indians, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$4,600;" so that the clause will read:

For insurance, transportation, and general incidental expenses of the delivery of goods, provisions, and stock, as per same article of same treaty, $4,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and thirty-two, in the appropriations for the Umpquas and Calapooias of Umpqua Valley, Oregon, to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$2,000" for the pay of a physician and purchase of medicines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and thirty-six, to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,450," for the pay of a teacher and purchase of books and stationery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line thirteen hundred and thirty-six, the following:

For Indians upon the Siletz reservation, Oregon, to provide agricultural implements, seeds, cattle, &c., to compensate them for losses sustained by reason of executive proclamation taking from them that portion of their reservation called Yaquina bay, $6,000.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have an explanation of that amendment.

Mr. CORBETT. I will state that these Indians were placed upon this reservation under a treaty and promised that they should be protected upon these lands and upon this bay, which is about thirty miles long, containing oysters and fish; a very desirable location for the Indians. They had made improvements upon it, built houses, and established themselves there permanently, in accordance with the treaty stipulations; but the Senate never ratified the treaty. It was made in 1855. Under that treaty, the Government was to pay them quite a sum of money. It has been customary to make an annual appropriation for the support of these Indians. They were established there, and had built houses, and this is to compensate them for their losses. This bay was opened by executive proclamation, opening a country nearly twenty-five miles square.

The Indians have become very much dissatisfied. I was upon the reservation, and they came together and had a long talk about it, and were very much dissatisfied. They said they did not want any more humbug about it. They wanted to know whether they were going to get it or not. I think that this is too small a sum of money; I think the appropriation ought to be at least $10,000. A bill for this purpose passed the Senate once, appropriating $10,000, and it was sent to the other House, where it has not been acted upon. I have reduced it to $6,000, to compensate these Indians for their loss, to establish them upon new homes, to give them agricultural implements, a few cattle, &c., in place of these oyster beds that they occupied, where they were taking oysters and selling them to a vessel that was running there. It has opened up a large extent of country which the whites have settled, for which the Government receives pay from the settlers. This proposition has the recommendation of the superintendent. He has recommended it in a number of previous reports. I will read from his report in 1865:

"A special report which I made to Hon. J. P. Usher, Secretary of the Interior, under date of December 12, 1864, in reply to inquiries concerning Yaquina bay, was published in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1865, (page 105.) To that I respectfully refer you for a full description of the coast reservation.

In that report I urged the importance of providing for a removal of the Indians located upon and about the bay before the land was thrown open to settlement. My suggestions in this respect were totally disregarded; and a district about twenty-five miles north and south, by twenty miles east and west, beginning two miles south of the Siletz agency, and including the whole of the Yaquina bay, was thrown open to settlement by an executive order."

He recommended that they be compensated, and it is proper to satisfy these Indians. It is a very small amount of money.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state that this question was brought up on a separate bill by the Senator from Oregon, which was discussed fully in the Senate, and passed. That bill made a larger appropriation. I believe it was $10,000. I have here cut down the appropriation from $10,000 to $6,000. There was a very thorough discussion of that bill in the Senate by the Senator from Oregon and others.

Mr. HOWE. I had no expectation of defeating the appropriation; I only wished to call attention to what seems to me to be a brand-new feature in our management of the Indians. If I understand the Senator from Oregon, here was a reservation, stretching out I do not know how far on the Pacific coast, set apart for the occupation of these Indians. In the process of opening up the immense mineral and other deposits on that coast a deposit of oysters was discovered here, and it seemed to be the gospel prevailing in that region that Indians were not entitled to oysters, and without waiting for any new treaty stipulations with the Indians by executive proclamation this portion of the reservation, which included the bay and the oyster-beds, was thrown open to settlement, and white settlers walked in and have purchased the lands of the Government, which the Government had before ceded to the Indians, have broken up the oyster trade which these cultivated Indians were prosecuting, and here is a proposition to appropriate $6,000, which may compensate them. I do not know what the value of that tract taken out of their reservation was; I do not know what the value of these oyster-beds was; but my judgment is that if this appropriation of $6,000 satisfies the Indians it does not satisfy justice, and will not until you appropriate a few halts to those who perpetrated this wrong on the Indians. I do not believe in that way of dealing with Indians.

Mr. CORBETT. The agent thought an appropriation of about ten thousand dollars would satisfy the Indians.

Mr. HOWE. But you have cut it down to $6,000.

Mr. HARLAN. I happen to be personally conversant with this transaction and officially privy to it; and I do not think I deserve a halter either. A treaty had been made with these Indians settling them on this reservation around this bay many years ago, and it remained in the possession of the Senate for a series of years, never was ratified, never was acted on; just, as I may say, treaties are now lying on the desk of the Senate unacted on. It was represented to the Government by those at that time representing Oregon here that there were not very many of these Indians; that the district of country assigned to them in the treaty unratified was more than was necessary for their occupancy; that it might with great propriety be diminished; that the Indians on the residue would have access to the bay and to the oyster fisheries, and other fisheries, perhaps equally easy as they would have if they held possession of the whole. It was represented that the country immediately in the rear of the bay was settling up by white people; that a very large district of agricultural country there was being settled up, and that they had no access to the bay; that in order to get to water communication, that is, communication with the coast, they would have to travel a good way round; I do not now remember the distance. The case being thus presented to the President, he ordered, as he had a perfect right to do under the law, that a part of this land should be regarded as public land and thrown open to settlement. There was no wrong intended on the Indians. The Government may have been to some extent misled. Those at that time representing Oregon here, in whom we confided, in whom all the Senators confided, represented that it was a proper thing to be done; that it would not result in any damage to the Indians, and was absolutely necessary for the promotion of the welfare of the settlement immediately behind this reservation, in order that the people might have access to the navigable waters of the coast. It turns out now that some of these Indians are dissatisfied, and for the purpose of satisfying them it is proposed to give them remuneration for some little property which they had in that part of the so-called reservation on which they at the time resided. It may have been a blunder; but if so, it was committed without any intention to wrong the Indians.

Mr. HOWE. I am bound to take notice of the introduction of two new facts that were not within my knowledge when I before spoke upon this question. One is that this treaty was not ratified. I did not understand that part of the statement before. I supposed this was set apart to them by a contract executed between them on the one side and the Government on the other.

Mr. CORBETT. They removed and gave up other lands, and the Government has been keeping them there by annual appropriations.

Mr. HOWE. The other fact is that the Senator from Iowa had anything to do with this provision. Of course I do not conceive that the Government owes him a halter or anything of the kind by any manner of means; but I am not any better satisfied with this way of dealing with the Indians than I was before I knew that the treaty was not ratified, or than I was before I knew that the Senator from Iowa had a hand in it. If this treaty was not ratified that was a wrong. The Indians were placed on this reservation, and they abandoned to the Government whatever they occupied before that time. I suppose that is not disputed. They gave up whatever we bargained for, and this reservation was the equivalent for that which they had surrendered. Now, without consulting the taste of the Indians or their wishes at all, the Executive withdraws from their occupation a portion of that reservation, throws it open to settlement; and now, without consulting the Indians, it is proposed to pay them off by an appropriation in this bill.

The Senator from Oregon a short time ago told us the extent to which these Indians were civilized, what schools they had there, what farms they had there, how industry is developed, how education is promoted among them, how they figure on the blackboard, how they repeat history, how they even state prophecy. I believe political prophecy, if no other. Sir, it is not the right way to treat Indian tribes to send ministers and schoolmasters to them with one hand and to take their reservations away from them with the other.

Mr. HARLAN. I inquire whether the Senator thinks the sum is too small? If he does I am willing to see it raised.

Mr. HOWE. I think it is too small or too large or I do not care which it is. The point is that you have no right to mention a sum at all until you know what will satisfy them. You ought to have obtained it by purchase from them. How can I tell whether it is too large or too small? The Senator from Oregon says that they asked $10,000, and he thinks he is doing a handsome thing by cutting them down to $6,000.

Mr. CORBETT. I asked $10,000. I thought that was nothing more than reasonable; but as there appears to be so much opposition to Indian bills I thought the Senator might object or some other Senator might to an appropriation of $10,000, and so I cut it down to $6,000. I find it very difficult even to get the $6,000 here.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Indians will find more difficulty than the Senator does in getting it. [Laughter.] That is my impression about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon what became of these Indians?

Mr. CORBETT. They have gone back to the interior of the reservation with no money to build them houses and no money to buy medicine for their sick, with no money to buy agricultural implements with; and they are getting along, subsisting as best they can. They are at work raising potatoes, digging with the hoe. It is a very good soil there. If they can have a few cattle and a few agricultural implements to start with, it will satisfy them and they can get a living in the interior of the reservation by farming.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do I understand the Senator to say that citizens of Oregon went in and took their possessions, their houses and lands, and occupied them?

Mr. CORBETT. After the Government opened the land by executive proclamation a tract of land twenty-five miles wide was thrown open, the Indians were removed, and people went in and took possession of that country which the Indians had occupied as a fishing ground.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Who took possession?

Mr. CORBETT. The whites did.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. By force?

Mr. CORBETT. The treaty had never been ratified and the Indians were removed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do I understand the Senator to say the citizens of Oregon drove these Indians by force of arms out of their possessions?

Mr. CORBETT. Yes, sir; and of California.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And the Senator comes now and asks that the Government of the United States shall indemnify the Indians for the losses created by taking from them their possession, by force of arms, by the people of Oregon and of California. That is rather a strong proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to this stigma being put on my State. These oysters were evidently stolen by Oregonians, and I want it to stand in that way.

Mr. CORBETT. You will find them in San Francisco, in Front street, at Philips's.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and forty-seven, to increase from $2,000 to $3,000 the appropriation for ninth of twenty installments for the purchase of mill fixtures, tools, medicines, &c., for the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla tribes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and fifty-three, to increase from $8,000 to $11,200 the appropriation for ninth of twenty installments for pay and subsistence of one superintendent of farming operations, one farmer, two millers, &c., for the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla tribes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and eighty-six, to increase from $300 to $500 the appropriation for ninth of twenty installments for support of schools, books, stationery, &c., for the Yakamas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and ninety, to increase from $1,500 to $3,200 the appropriation for ninth of twenty installments for the employment of one superintendent of teaching and two teachers for the Yakamas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen hundred and ninety-six, to increase from $8,000 to $11,400 the appropriation for ninth of twenty installments for the employment of one superintendent of farming operations, two farmers, two millers, &c., for the Yakamas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and six, to strike out "$300" and insert "$500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and nine, to strike out "$300" and insert "$500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and thirty-six, to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "seventy;" so as to make the clause read:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in the Territory of Arizona, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and forty-one, to increase from $5,000 to $7,500 the appropriation for general incidental expenses of the Indian service in California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines fourteen hundred and forty-eight and fourteen hundred and forty-nine, to increase from $20,000 to $25,000 the appropriation for the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Colorado Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and sixty-four, to increase from $15,000 to $20,000 the appropriation for the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Idaho Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fourteen hundred and sixty-four:

For amount found due to the United States, on the settlement of accounts of Caleb Lyon, late Governor, &c., of Idaho, claimed by him to have been stolen, $46,418 40.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us hear something about that.

Mr. CORBETT. I know something about it. This amount of money is due to the Nez Perce Indians, and it has been withheld from them two or three years, in consequence of the shortcomings of one of the superintendents appointed for Idaho. Governor Lyon took the money, and returning here after his removal, he attempted to bring it back; and he is said to have lost it on the way. He claims that it was stolen from him. These Indians are now here, and have come here to know the reason why their treaty stipulations have not been lived up to. It is in consequence of this money having been stolen. There are many improvements, schools, and other things, that were promised to them which they have not obtained, and the young men of the tribe are becoming very much dissatisfied. The head chief, Sawyer, has always been loyal to the white people, and has fought for the whites in that country during the Indian wars, and furnished horses and men to fight the Snakes and other Indian tribes. When Governor Stevens went through that country, and it was supposed he would be cut off, Lawyer sent a messenger with horses to bring him through.

These Indians make it a matter of pride that they never have shed the blood of a white man, although many of their Indians have been killed, some ten or a dozen. They have always been very friendly, and the people there have the strongest feeling of friendship for the tribe. It is one of the most capable tribes on the Pacific coast. Lawyer is a man of considerable intelligence. He talks English. Certainly this money should be paid to the Indians.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to have the Senator state to the Senate some of the facts and circumstances connected with the original loss of this money. It is an easy thing to take out of the Treasury any amount of money for the second time I suppose, but I should like to hear what the committee know, what they have ascertained in regard to the loss, where the money was lost, how it was lost, and what were the circumstances.

Mr. HENDERSON. We appointed Caleb Lyon Governor of the Territory of Idaho, and of course he was ex-officio superintendent of Indian Affairs. We put into his hands this money; he got the money in the Territory; it was placed in his hands for a specific purpose; but he returned from the Territory without having made the expenditure and he claims to have lost the money between New York city and this town.

Mr. CONNESS. Then he brought the money back with him.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly. Surely he did not make the expenditure of the money in the Territory. He did not expend the money for the purpose enjoined on him at the time the money was placed in his hands. This is a proposition to reappropriate this amount of money for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. CONNESS. Have no steps been taken to investigate the matter?

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that the Department have taken steps, but whether they will get the money out of the securities or not is another question. The case before the Senate is this: money was placed by the Government in the hands of this man; it is an admitted fact that our agent, whom we appointed ourselves, and in whose hands we placed the money, has lost the money, and the Indians have not got the benefit of it. It is true, as the Senator from Oregon says, that the Indians are complaining, and bitterly complaining, of this alleged theft on the part of our agent. I do not know whether he took the money or not, or whether it was actually stolen from him; but the question is whether we shall reappropriate the money for the benefit of the Indians. If the Senate think we ought not to do it, of course they will vote down the proposition. We appropriated the money, and put in the hands of Governor Lyon, but it was never applied to the purpose for which we intended it. He claims that it was stolen from him; others claim that he stole the money himself. How that is I do not know. This is a proposition to reappropriate the money and place it in the hands of another agent. A part of the money belonged to the Nez Perce. Eighteen thousand six hundred and thirty-one dollars belonged to the Nez Perce, and some to the Flatheads and Yakamas, and other tribes of Idaho. It is a simple proposition to reappropriate the money for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the form in which this amendment is proposed. It does not appropriate any money to any tribe of Indians, but it appropriates for an amount found due to the United States, $46,000. I understand that Mr. Caleb Lyon did lose some money placed in his hands for trust purposes. I never understood for what purpose. It is part of the history of this transaction that he had a claim pending before the Committee on Claims for this amount, and the committee reported against allowing the claim. The Senator from California [Mr. Cole] is more familiar with it than I am. He wanted us to appropriate or to give him credit for this same amount of money. As I understand the Senator from Missouri this money was due to several different tribes. If so, it seems to me it should be appropriated to those several tribes, but this amendment is appropriating money because money is due to us, not due to other folks. It is appropriating $46,000 because Caleb Lyon owes the United States $46,000. The language is:

For amount due to the United States on the settlement of accounts of Caleb Lyon, &c.

Mr. HENDERSON. By looking at the estimates the Senator will see that I have adopted the language there used. The Senator's comments are perfectly correct, and I will remedy the difficulty. I copied the language of the Department. I move to amend the amendment by adding "to be appropriated to the Indians to whom the funds in the hands of said Lyon belonged at the time of the loss."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. It will be impossible to close this bill before the dinner hour; in fact, I suppose it will take us two or three hours longer. I therefore now submit a motion that at five o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The reading of the amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs was resumed.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and seventy-one, to increase from $15,000 to $20,000 the appropriation for the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Montana Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fourteen hundred and seventy-one:

For the purchase of a grist and saw mill, to be erected for the use of Flathead agency, &c., $10,000.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the phraseology of that amendment ought to be changed so as to read "for the use of the Indians of the Flathead agency," and the words "and so forth" should be stricken out. I move so to amend it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and seventy-eight, to increase the appropriation for the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Nevada from $20,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and eighty-five, to increase the appropriation for general incidental expenses of the Indian service in New Mexico from $30,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and ninety-two, to increase the appropriation for general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Oregon and Washington Territory from $25,000 to $35,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen hundred and ninety-nine, to increase from $15,000 to $25,000 the appropriation for general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen hundred and three, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For the transportation and necessary expenses of delivery of provisions to the Indians within the Utah superintendency, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen hundred and seventeen, to strike out "$11,000" and insert "$22,825;" so as to make the clause read:

Miscellaneous:

For the expenses of colonizing, supporting, and furnishing agricultural implements and stock, pay of necessary employes, purchasing clothing, medicine, iron, and steel, maintenance of schools for Indians lately residing in Texas, but now residing on the Choctaw land, to be expended under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $22,825.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen hundred and twenty-four, to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$37,800;" so as to make the clause read:

For the Wichitas and other affiliated bands:

For the expenses of colonizing, supporting, and furnishing said bands with agricultural implements and stock, pay of necessary employes, purchase of clothing, medicines, iron and steel, and maintenance of schools, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $37,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen hundred and thirty, to insert after "carpenter" the words "and one teacher;" to strike out in lines fifteen hundred and thirty-one and fifteen hundred and thirty-two, after "California," the words "at the rate of fifty dollars per month;" to strike out in lines fifteen hundred and thirty-two and fifteen hundred and thirty-three, after the word "and," the words "for the pay of one school teacher upon each" and insert "one herdsman, one miller, and one clerk upon each of the Round Valley and Hoopa Valley;" and in lines fifteen hundred and thirty-three and fifteen hundred and thirty-four, to strike out after the word "reservations" the words "at the rate of seventy-five dollars per month, $15,600," and insert "$25,920;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one physician, one blacksmith, one assistant blacksmith, one farmer, one carpenter, and one teacher upon each of the four reservations of California, and one herdsman, one miller, and one clerk upon each of the Round Valley and Hoopa Valley reservations, $25,920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fifteen hundred and thirty-four:

For the purchase of a grist and saw mill, Round Valley reservation, California, $5,000.

For the purchase of the Tule river Indian farm, $12,800.

For expense of removal and subsistence of Indians, not parties to any treaty, in Oregon and Washington Territories, and for pay of necessary employes, $50,000.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the indebtedness incurred for the Indian service in California, in the years 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, and 1867, $50,000.

For surveying Indian reserves under treaty stipulations, $60,546.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let the items for a deficiency in the Indian service in California in 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, and 1867, be stricken out. We do not intend to have it in this bill. It is clearly a deficiency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines fifteen hundred and forty, fifteen hundred and forty-one, fifteen hundred and forty-two, and fifteen hundred and forty-three, in these words:

For subsistence for the Navajo Indians, and for the purchase of sheep, seeds, agricultural implements, and other articles necessary for breaking ground on the reservation upon the Pecos river, $100,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For amount of deficiencies expended in subsisting the Navajos at the Bosque Redondo, from the 21st of February, 1863, up to the time of making their late treaty, agreeing to remove to their old homes, $120,000.

For cost of removal of the Navajos from the Bosque Redondo to their old home, and for sheep, cattle, and corn, as provided for in article twelve of the new treaty, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be needed.

For annuity goods, not exceeding five dollars per head, as provided in article eight of the new treaty, $38,500.

For seeds, farming implements, work, cattle, and other stock, provided for in article seven of said treaty, $200,000.

For constructing warehouse, as per article three, $2,500.

For constructing agency building, $3,000.

For constructing blacksmith and carpenter shop, $2,000.

For constructing school-house, $5,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state for the information of the Senate that this large appropriation is proposed in consequence of letters of General Sherman and the peace commissioners who have recently made a treaty with these Indians. They have removed them back from the Bosque Redondo to their old homes. It is unnecessary to have the correspondence read. I have put down the items to the lowest possible figure. The treaty has been made, and they have been returned back. General Sherman says he feels satisfied that this is the last appropriation of any consequence that will be required except the regular annuities. It ought to be remembered that the War Department for the last four or five years has been paying for these Indians from three quarters of a million to a million dollars annually.

Mr. HOWE. The treaty has not been ratified, I believe.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; it is now pending; but the military have removed the Indians.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know how these deficiencies occur. The deficiency is said there to be $120,000. Who is furnishing the supplies? How has the business been carried on? Who are the parties furnishing them, and in what manner have supplies been furnished to such an extent that $120,000 are now due? If the Indians have been supplied by rations from the Army, then I should like to know how these deficiencies could occur?

Mr. HENDERSON. There is a document explaining the whole matter, but I can do it in a few words. The Senate will remember that last year we appropriated but $100,000. I stated at the time the appropriation was made that it would be utterly impossible to subsist the Navajoes on any such amount. The Senator from Ohio, who was then managing the bill, agreed that in case that appropriation should run out, and the Navajoes should be in distress, should need food, the military might be authorized to subsist them from that time on after the expenditure of the $100,000. Of course the $100,000 were very soon expended. The military authorities then did for a very considerable time furnish them rations from the forts in the vicinity. It will be remembered, however, that at the July session last year there was an amendment put on a deficiency bill requiring that the Navajoes should be turned over again from the military authorities to the civil authorities. When they were turned over the civil authorities found themselves without a dollar to feed them, and they employed an individual to furnish the articles upon credit; and this individual went on and furnished them at very reasonable rates.

Mr. CONNESS. I saw a statement in the newspapers, I do not know whether it was true or not, that there was a contract made with Mr. Perry Fuller to furnish a certain amount, and that he sub-contracted it to another person, making forty cents on each ration. I do not know what the facts are, but these things ought to be inquired into. If any contract was made with the Department which would admit such a margin to the contractor there is something rotten about it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will send up a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject.

The Chief Clerk read the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 6, 1888.

Sir: Referring to office report of the 21st of February last, inviting attention to former reports, relative to feeding the Navajo Indian captives on the Bosque Redondo reservation, New Mexico, advising the Department that the funds appropriated by Congress were exhausted and setting forth the necessity of an appropriation being made to continue supplying them with food, I desire to say that the contractor, Elijah Simerly, esq., continued furnishing stores under his contract until the 22d day of May last, from which time until the Indians were taken charge of by the Indian peace commission the necessary subsistence was furnished by James Patterson, esq., of New Mexico, under a contract made with him by Agent Dodd.

There is due Mr. Simerly a balance on account, for the stores furnished by him during the month of March last, the sum of $17,346 06, and for those furnished during the month of April and up to the 22d of May about the sum of seventy-two thousand eight hundred dollars, making in all about the sum of ninety thousand one hundred and forty-six dollars and six cents now due and owing to him. The accounts for April and May have not been presented for payment, consequently it is impossible to state the exact amount for those months; but taking the cost of the stores furnished in March as a basis and the cost of those furnished the two following months will amount to over the sum above stated $72,800.

There will also be due Mr. Patterson on his contract from May 22 up to the time the removal of said Indians commenced, which was probably near the end of last month, not far from $30,000. This will make the total deficiency in the appropriation for subsisting the Navajoes, amount to as near as can be calculated, about one hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

The last-mentioned sum should be appropriated and placed at the disposal of your Department at the earliest day practicable, in order that the parties to whom it is owing may be paid their just dues. I therefore respectfully request that the matter be laid before Congress for proper action by that body.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to inquire of the honorable chairman whether he has knowledge of how these contracts were made? It is said that a large contract was made with Agent Dodd. Were these contracts made after advertisement and given to the lowest bidder? How were they made?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from California has propounded a question that I cannot answer. I do not know how the contract was made. I do not know whether it was after advertisement or not. I understand, however, that the contract was at nineteen cents per day. I understand from the acting commissioner that these Indians were fed at nineteen cents a day, and that Mr. Fuller had nothing to do with the contract.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not state that he had; and if he had he would have a right to make the contract, of course.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course, if it were a fair contract, he would be as much entitled to it as anybody else; but the gentlemen who made the contract at nineteen cents a day were Mr. Patterson and Mr. Simerly, and they furnished the rations, and unwillingly furnished them. They had a previous contract, I understand, and took that contract upon advertisement, and refused to furnish any more at the same price; but at the request of Mr. Dodd, who is one of our best agents, a man of undoubted integrity, as I understand, they were induced to go on and furnish at the same price after the appropriation had ceased.

Mr. HOWE. Our appropriation for subsisting these same Indians for the last year was $100,000, and the estimate for subsisting them for the next year is precisely the same, $100,000, and yet it is said there is a deficiency in last year's appropriation of $120,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes; but this year's appropriation was made upon the distinct understanding that the Navajoes were to be removed. It was understood that they were not to be kept at the Bosque Redondo. Indeed, the peace commission expected to make a treaty with them for their removal last fall, but were unable to reach New Mexico before the meeting of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. But the estimate is made for subsisting them "on the Pecos river," precisely where they were last year.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the Senator say that the estimate is only $100,000?

Mr. HOWE. So I read the estimates.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is a mistake. They never have been subsisted for any such sum. It is a notorious fact that we have never spent less than from three quarters of a million to a million on them since they have been there. The Department asked for $600,000 when we appropriated $100,000.

Mr. HOWE. What is the estimate on the book?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not able to turn to it just now. Upon the other point in regard to the treaty, I will say that I have in my hands a letter from General Sherman, but I deem it unnecessary to have it read. It is a lengthy letter, addressed to me, in which he gives the reasons why the commission concluded to remove the Indians to their old country. He says that the treaty has been made in the expectation that the $150,000 should be appropriated. "So Tappan and I acted with full confidence, presuming on the passage of the bill for $150,000 for their removal, and therefore we will proceed for their removal and put it in immediate execution. The distance is about three hundred miles northwest." The treaty has been printed and is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have the estimate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not see the estimate, but I am confident it could not have been so little as $100,000 for subsisting the Navajoes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen hundred and fifty-two, after the word "Indians" to insert "known as the Santee Sioux," and in line fifteen hundred and fifty-three, after the word "homes," to insert "near the mouth of the Niobrara;" so that the clause will read:

For subsistence, clothing, and general incidental expenses of the Sisseton, Wahpeton, Medawakanton, and Waupakoota bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, known as the Santee Sioux, at their new homes near the mouth of the Niobrara, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fifteen hundred and fifty-three, the following:

For presents of clothing and tobacco for the Indians at Aleutian Islands, Alaska Territory, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fifteen hundred and fifty-nine the following:

To pay the expenses of a commissioner to be appointed to fix the cost of property and improvements on farms confiscated and sold by Cherokee nation, under laws of said nation made during the late rebellion, $2,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fifteen hundred and sixty-seven the following:

For expenses of removing and subsisting destitute Cherokees, now in the State of Texas and Choctaw and Chickasaw country, to their homes in the Cherokee country, $20,000.

To pay expenses of two commissioners appointed to appraise Cherokee neutral lands, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $4,550, to be refunded from sales of said lands.

Mr. HARLAN. The first part of that amendment I should like to hear explained:

For expenses of removing and subsisting destitute Cherokees, now in the State of Texas, and Choctaw and Chickasaw country, to their homes in the Cherokee country, $20,000.

These are all rich people. They have vast sums of money due them in the Treasury of the United States; and I do not understand why the Government should appropriate money to pay their traveling expenses.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a report from the Secretary of the Interior, "relative to removing certain destitute Indians scattered through the Indian country to their homes; with estimates of appropriations needed therefor." I will send the document up to the Clerk, and he can read it, for I really know nothing about it.

Mr. SUMNER. With the permission of the Senator, before he does that, I desire to move an executive session. There is occasion for one for a few minutes before the recess.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection, it is so near the time for taking the recess.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 424) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men" was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. The doors were reopened at five o'clock, and the Senate took a recess until half past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

MANUFACTURERS' BANK OF NEW YORK.

Mr. CATTELL. I ask the Senate to take up the Senate bill No. 621. It is a bill that will create no discussion, and can be passed in a few minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location. It proposes to authorize the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York, now located in the city of New York, to change its location to the city of Brooklyn. Whenever the stockholders representing three fourths of the capital of the bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change, the president and cashier are to execute a certificate under the corporate seal of the bank, specifying such determination, and cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and thereupon such change of location is to be effected and the operations of discount and deposit of the bank are to be carried on in the city of Brooklyn. Nothing in this act is to be construed as in any manner to release the bank from any liability, or affect any action or proceeding in law in which the bank may be a party or interested. And when such change shall have been determined upon notice thereof and of such change is to be published in at least two daily newspapers in each of the counties of New York and Kings, in the State of New York, for not less than ten days.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER M. CARMICHAEL.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) for the relief of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany, have had it under consideration, and directed me to report it back without amendment and with a recommendation that it pass. It is a resolution of only eight lines, and is merely a formal matter, and I therefore ask to have it considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in auditing and adjusting the accounts of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany, to admit and allow the charge of $1,008, the same having been paid by him to John Hastings, deputy surveyor and inspector of the port.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Hastings was deputy surveyor, but did not think it necessary to take the oath of office for that position, he having been deputy collector. It is merely a formal matter. It is recommended by Mr. Sargent. They cannot pay the money, as he did not take the oath, because he was deputy collector.

Mr. COLE. The bill ought to pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 301, authorizing the purchase of certain public lands in Alabama.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before that is taken up I wish to make a motion to reconsider the bill which the Senator from Nevada called up the other evening before Senators generally got in, restoring certain persons in the southern States to their political rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill has been signed and enrolled, I am told.

Mr. STEWART. And was sent to the President to-day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move that it be recalled. I wish to state the reason. I understand that it restores all the rebels who participated in the war who are members of the Georgia Legislature, and who support what is called the Radical policy, and refuses to restore those persons elected to that same Legislature who hold other views. I have no objection to restoring these people on equal, fair terms. It is right. These persons are elected by the people and are restored. Then restore all that are elected by the people. They are all elected under the reconstruction law. It is but fair to let all the members of that Legislature be restored. I received a letter on the subject yesterday, but could not get the floor to make the motion to reconsider at that time, and therefore, if it be practicable, I wish to make it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk, who is much better acquainted with the rules than I profess to be, says it is not in order to do that. However, the motion may be entered, and if we can find that it is in order, it can be entertained. I do not profess to know how that is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let the motion be entered, and if necessary the bill be recalled.

Until it becomes a law, I suppose, within two days after its passage it is always within the control of either House. This thing of restoring by special legislation ought to be fair, it ought to be equal.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will allow me to say that the cure for this case is for the Senator to introduce a bill restoring the parties he proposes and give us an opportunity to vote for it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is no remedy at all.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the true remedy. The passage of that bill does not prevent the restoration of others.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let the motion be entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can be entered, but it is doubtful whether it can be entertained.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. STEWART. I now renew my motion to take up the bill I have named. It is a bill of only two lines. Let it be read.

Mr. WILLEY. Before it is read, I desire to know if it is a House bill?

Mr. STEWART. No; it is a Senate bill.

Mr. WILLEY. I think on an occasion like this, and under the circumstances, we ought to confine ourselves to House bills.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. WILLEY. There are a great many House bills that require merely formal action to perfect them.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will hear the bill read, that is all I ask of him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 301) authorizing the purchase of certain public lands in Alabama. The preamble recites that by the act of Congress approved June 21, 1866, the disposal of lands in Alabama is now restricted to actual settlers under the homestead laws; and it is shown that such hilly, mountainous, vacant public lands are unfit for homestead purposes in the counties of Jackson, Jefferson, Shelby, and Bibb, in the State aforesaid. The bill, therefore, provides that from and after its passage, such lands in those counties shall be subject to sale as other public lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hold in my hand a public bill, House bill No. 1205, which I have been requested by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to urge upon the early attention of the Senate. They have reported several amendments to it. It is a bill without the passage of which Congress could not very safely adjourn, and I presume they would not. It is essential to the proper administration of the Post Office Department of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the title of it.

Mr. RAMSEY. "A bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws." It is a House bill to which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have reported a number of amendments. We cannot well adjourn without it; indeed, we will not. It can be passed in a short time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws. It provides that when any writer of a letter, on which the postage is prepaid, shall indorse in writing or in print upon the outside thereof his name and address, the same, after remaining uncalled for at the post office to which it is directed thirty days, or the time the writer may direct, shall be returned to the writer without additional postage, whether a specific request for such return be indorsed on the letter or not. No money order is to be issued for less than one dollar nor more than fifty dollars; and all persons who receive money orders are to be required to pay therefor the following charges or fees: for one dollar or any sum not exceeding twenty dollars, a fee of ten cents is to be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving the order; for all orders exceeding twenty dollars and not exceeding thirty dollars, the charge is to be fifteen cents; for all orders exceeding thirty dollars and not exceeding forty dollars, the fee is to be twenty cents; for all orders exceeding forty dollars and not exceeding fifty dollars, the fee is to be twenty-five cents.

Section thirty-five of the act of March 3, 1863, is to be so construed as to permit weekly newspapers, when sent to regular subscribers, to be delivered free of postage, when deposited at the office nearest to the office of publication; but nothing in this act is to be so construed as to require carriers to distribute the papers unless postage is paid upon them.

Mr. RAMSEY. Unless I am called upon for an explanation, I shall say nothing. The bill is very plain, and any gentleman can understand it on its reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will be read.

The first amendment was in section two, line one, after the word "that," to strike out the words "no money order shall be issued for less than one dollar nor more than fifty dollars, and;" so that it will read:

That all persons who receive money orders shall be required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the second section the following:

And furthermore, that the compensation of deputy postmasters for the payment of money orders is hereby increased from one eighth to one fourth of one per cent. on the gross amount of orders paid at their respective offices, and that nothing contained in any act shall be so construed as to deprive postmasters at money-order offices of the compensation for transacting the money-order business fixed by the act of May 17, 1864, and modified as stated in this section: Provided always, That the amount of such annual compensation, together with the postmaster's salary, shall not, in any case, exceed the salary established by law for postmasters of the first class.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out all of the third section after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That section thirty-five of the act of March 3, 1863, shall be so construed as to permit weekly newspapers, when sent to regular subscribers, to be delivered free of postage when deposited at the office nearest to the office of publication; but nothing in this act shall be so construed as to require carriers to distribute said papers, unless postage is paid upon them.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That section thirty-five of the act of March 3, 1863, shall be so construed as to permit weekly newspapers, properly folded and addressed, when sent to regular subscribers, in the county where printed and published, to be delivered free of postage when deposited at the office nearest to the office of publication; but nothing in this act shall be so construed as to require carriers to distribute said papers unless postage is paid upon them at the rate of five cents per quarter, and such postage must be prepaid for a term not less than one quarter or more than one year, either at the office of mailing or of delivery, at the option of the subscriber.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in case of the loss of a money order, a duplicate thereof shall be issued by the superintendent of the money-order office without charge, on the application of the remitter or payee of the original: Provided, That the applicant furnish a certificate from the postmaster on whom the same was drawn that it had not been and would not thereafter be paid, and a similar certificate from the postmaster by whom it was issued that it had not been and would not be repaid to the purchaser; and a second fee shall not be charged for a duplicate money-order issued to replace an order that has been rendered invalid because of non-presentation for payment within one year after its date, or because of illegal indorsements.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely forge or counterfeit, or willingly aid, assist, or abet in falsely forging or counterfeiting, or shall procure, directly or indirectly, to be falsely forged or counterfeited any postal money order, or any material signature or indorsement to any postal money order issued by the Post Office Department, or any of its agents, for the purpose and with the intent of obtaining or receiving, directly or indirectly, or of procuring or enabling others to obtain or receive, directly or indirectly, any sum or sums of money, and thereby to defraud either the United States or any person of such sum or sums of money, or any part thereof, or shall pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish as true any such forged or counterfeited postal money order with intent to defraud either the United States or any person of any sum or sums of money, knowing such postal money order, or any signature or indorsement thereon, to be so falsely forged or counterfeited, every such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and being thereof duly convicted shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept at hard labor for a period of not less than two years nor more than five years, and to be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint and employ on board of each of the mail steamers plying on the route between San Francisco, Japan, and China, and between San Francisco and Honolulu, (Hawaiian Islands), a Government agent in charge of the United States mails, at an annual salary of $2,000 each per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish in connection with the United States mail steamship service to Japan and China, a general postal agency at Shanghai, China, with such branch agencies at other ports in China and Japan as shall, in his judgment, be necessary for the prompt and efficient management of the postal service in those countries; and to pay the postal agents so appointed and employed a reasonable compensation for their services, in addition to the necessary expenses for rent, furniture, clerks, &c., to be allowed at each office for conducting the postal business, a report on which shall be embraced in the annual report of the Postmaster General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That for the more efficient management of the increased postal business connected with the foreign mail service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint in his Department a superintendent of foreign mails, at an annual salary of $3,000, and also three additional clerks for that branch of the postal service, to wit: One of class four, and two of class three; and that the salary of the superintendent of the money-order system shall be $3,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is, authorized to appoint in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, a chief of division for the dead-letter office at a salary of $2,500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That if any person employed in any department of the Post Office establishment of the United States shall, willfully and knowingly, use or cause to be used in prepayment of postage any postage stamp or stamped envelope issued or which may hereafter be issued by authority of any act of Congress or of the Postmaster General which has already been once used for a like purpose, or shall remove or attempt to remove the canceling or defacing marks from any such postage stamp or stamped envelope with intent to use or cause the use of the same a second time, or to sell or offer to sell the same, or shall remove from letters or other mail matter deposited in or received at a post office the stamps attached to the same in payment of postage, with intent to use the same a second time for a like purpose, or to sell or offer to sell the same, every such offender shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than three years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That if any person not employed in any department of the Post Office establishment of the United States shall commit any of the offenses described in the preceding section of this act every such person shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than one year, or by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500 for each offense, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That section nine of an act of Congress, approved July 1, 1864, authorizing the sales of postage stamps and stamped envelopes at a discount, be so modified that the quantities of each sold at any one time to the same party shall not exceed $100 in value; and that such sales shall be restricted to certain designated agents who will agree to sell again without discount under rules to be fixed by the Postmaster General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to deposit in a post office, to be sent by mail, any letters or circulars concerning lotteries, so-called gift concerts, or other similar enterprises offering prizes of any kind on any pretext whatever, and that postmasters receiving what they have reason to believe to be such letters or circulars, shall send them to the dead-letter office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to establish a blank agency for the Post Office Department, to be located in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and to appoint one superintendent at an annual salary of $1,800, one assistant superintendent at an annual salary of $1,600, and three other assistants at an annual salary of $1,000 each, and two laborers at an annual salary of $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to conclude arrangements with the post departments of foreign countries, with which international postal conventions have been or shall be concluded, for the exchange of small sums of money by means of postal orders, the maximum amount of which shall not exceed that fixed by law for domestic money orders, at such rates of exchange and under such rules and regulations as he may deem expedient; and that the expense incurred in establishing and conducting such system of exchange may be paid out of the proceeds of the money-order business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the proviso in section three of the act approved March 3, 1825, entitled "An act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall repeal any of the provisions of the act approved July 11, 1862, entitled "An act in relation to the Post Office Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if, on the final settlement of the account of any postmaster, it shall appear that such postmaster is indebted to the United States, and suit shall not be instituted within three years after the close of such account, then, and in that case, the sureties on the bond of such postmaster shall not be liable to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That copies of the quarterly returns of postmasters, and of any papers pertaining to the accounts in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, certified by him under his seal of office, shall be admitted as evidence in the court of the United States in criminal prosecutions, in the same manner as the same are now admitted in civil cases, as provided in section fifteen of an act entitled "An act to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof," approved July 2, 1836.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That in all suits for the recovery of balances due from postmasters a copy, duly certified under the seal of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, of the statement of any postmaster, special agent, or other person employed by the Postmaster General or the said Auditor for that purpose, that he has mailed a letter to such delinquent postmaster at the post office where the indebtedness accrued, or at his last and usual place of abode, and that a sufficient time has elapsed in the ordinary course of mail to have reached its destination, and has not received payment of such balance within the time designated in his instructions, shall be received as sufficient evidence in the courts of the United States or other courts that a demand has been made on such delinquent postmaster: Provided, nevertheless, That when the account of a late postmaster has been once adjusted and settled, and a demand made for the balance appearing to be due and afterward allowances shall be made or credits entered on the account, it shall not be necessary to make a further demand for the new balance found to be due.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to prescribe a uniform dress to be worn by the letter carriers at the several free delivery offices, and that any person not connected with this branch of the service who shall wear the uniform that may be prescribed in accordance herewith shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not more than $100, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court before which such conviction shall be had.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

L. MERCHANT AND CO. AND P. ROSECRANTZ.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1320 reported to-day from the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co. and Peter Rosecrantz was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Leander Merchant, of the firm of L. Merchant & Co., the sum of $109,412 81, the proceeds of six hundred and eighty-four bales of cotton, the private property of that firm, taken erroneously and without due authority by the agents of the United States civil and military authorities at Mobile, Alabama, in the month of April, 1865, shipped to New York, sold by the United States, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury, the charges and expenses of the United States having been deducted therefrom; and to Peter Rosecrantz the sum of $39,253 10, the proceeds of two hundred and forty-one bales of cotton, the private property of Rosecrantz, taken, sold, and appropriated at the same time and place, and in the same manner, the charges and expenses of the United States having likewise been deducted therefrom.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to inquire what rule of value has been adopted by the committee, whether the value at Mobile or the value at New York, and at what time, whether at the time the property was taken or at some other period.

Mr. WILLEY. We took the proceeds of the sale actually paid into the Treasury, deducting the expenses for transportation. The cotton was sold by the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I expect that is the right rule.

Mr. WILLEY. There was a very rigid examination of this case in the House of Representatives. I have compared the evidence with the report made there. The report in the House was unanimous; the report in the Senate was unanimous. If any Senator desires the reading of the report I will send it to the desk.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I inquire of the honorable Senator from West Virginia whether this bill has been examined by the Committee on Claims?

Mr. WILLEY. It comes from the Committee on Claims, reported this morning favorably, after a rigid and close examination. It is a House bill, which has been passed by the House, come here, referred to the Committee on Claims, of which the honorable Senator is a member, and examined by them this morning.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not examined this bill at all, although I am a member of the Committee on Claims. I have had no opportunity to do so. My engagements have led me in another direction. I wish to inquire of the honorable Senator where this cotton was taken, whether within the rebel lines or elsewhere?

Mr. WILLEY. No, sir; it was not within the rebel lines.

Mr. HOWE. I see this bill is leading to discussion, and I think I must call for the regular order.

Mr. WILLEY. I trust not. The case is so obviously correct that I hope it will be allowed to pass.

Mr. HOWE. I must call for the order of the evening.

Mr. WILLEY. I hope the Senator from Michigan will withdraw his objection. There can be no possible doubt about the case.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to pay the expenses incident to the recovery of certain captives in the hands of the Comanches and Kiowa Indians of the plains; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to supplies furnished by J. R. Brown for Indians in the vicinity of Devil's lake, Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I do not know whether it is in order or not, but if it is I should like to take up House bill No. 1010.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] calls for the regular order.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall go on with the unfinished business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought we came here to-night to consider the appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is pending all the time, and can only be passed over by common consent.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1869.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a small amendment which has been made through misapprehension, I think. In line fourteen hundred the appropriation should be $500 instead of $300, and I think that amendment was recommended by the committee; but instead of that, that change is made in line fourteen hundred and four. The clause now reads:

For ninth of twenty installments for keeping in repair saw and flouring mills, and for furnishing the necessary tools and fixtures, per fifth article treaty 9th June, 1855, $300.

That should be $500 there, instead of in line fourteen hundred and four. It is in the appropriations for the Yakama nation. I think the change in line fourteen hundred and four from $300 to $500 should not have been made.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the Senator is right. That change can be made in lines fourteen hundred and fourteen hundred and four.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made if there be no objection. The question now is on the amendment pending prior to the recess, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to insert after line fifteen hundred and sixty-seven the following:

For expenses of removing and subsisting destitute

Cherokees, now in the State of Texas and Choctaw and Chickasaw country, to their homes in the Cherokee country, $20,000.

To pay expenses of two commissioners appointed to appraise Cherokee neutral lands, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $4,550, to be refunded from sales of said lands.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask that the vote may be taken separately on the first clause of the amendment. I think that clearly ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the first clause of the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire before the vote is taken on that clause that the estimate and the letter of the Department may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 27, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 10th instant, with accompanying papers, in relation to removing certain destitute Cherokee Indians, now scattered through the Indian territory, to their homes in the Cherokee country, together with a statement and estimate of the probable cost of removing said Indians, and of subsisting them for three months after they reach their home.

The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to the favorable consideration of the subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary of the Interior.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of a letter from the principal chief and chairman of the delegation of Cherokees, dated the 28th ultimo, inclosing a copy of a communication from late Superintendent Byers, relative to the removal of certain destitute Cherokees, scattered through the Indian territory, to their homes in the Cherokee country, making a statement in regard to the matter, and submitting an estimate of the probable cost of such removal and the subsistence of the persons who are removed for three months after their arrival home.

The fact that there are many of the Cherokees who left their homes during the late war and have since been unable to return from the want of means and assistance, has long been known to this office. It has been impossible for the Department to afford any help to these destitute persons, owing to their being no funds at its disposal that could be used either for removing or subsisting them.

It is the opinion of this office that some steps should be taken to have the Indians in question returned to their homes at the earliest day practicable. To do this it will be necessary to have Congress appropriate the necessary funds. The estimates submitted by the principal chief of the nation and the chairman of the delegation is considered too high. It is thought that $75,000 will be sufficient for the purpose, and also that the removal of the Indians and disbursement of the funds should be made under the directions of your Department instead of the nation.

If you coincide with me in the views herein expressed, I respectfully request that the matter be laid before Congress for such action as in its wisdom may be deemed necessary and proper.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

WASHINGTON, D. C. February 29, 1868.

SIR: The undersigned, representatives of the Cherokee nation, have the honor herewith to lay before you a copy of a communication from Hon. William Byers, late superintendent of Indian affairs, marked "A," under date of January 10, 1867, asking for the removal and relief of certain absentee destitute Cherokees, who have been left, by the operation of the late war, in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek nations, as also in the States of Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kansas, and elsewhere, and who desire to return to their homes in the Cherokee nation, but are unable to do so on account of their extreme destitution.

We are advised that this important matter has, from time to time, been brought to the attention of both the Interior and War Departments, since the communication of the superintendent referred to above was presented by a delegation of Cherokees, consisting of Messrs. Fields, Adair, and Seales, but without any satisfactory results. From time to time, since the war, our nation and citizens have moved a portion of these people, but, after repeated efforts, they find it impossible to effect anything further in regard to their removal, not having any means so to do; so that there are yet away from their homes, according to the best of our information, not less than one thousand Cherokees, chiefly helpless women and children. As before intimated, these people are not confined to any particular class, but are scattered from Kansas to Texas, and over different portions of the Indian territory, and are now entirely helpless, and have no effective source but the magnanimity of the Government to which to appeal as their guardian and protector. The average distance over which they will have to be removed will be about one hundred and seventy-five miles to reach their homes. During their removal they will have to be subsisted, and, after they reach their homes, they should be sustained a short season—say three months—until by their own labor they may be able to sustain themselves. We herewith submit a statement, marked "B," showing the probable costs and expenses in removing and subsisting these people, and would respectfully request that an estimate be made and submitted by the Department of the Interior for their removal and subsistence to Congress, as we are informed has been recently done for the Creek Indians; and that the necessary appropriation be asked for, and turned over to our principal chief, to speedily restore all of our absentee Cherokees to their homes. Trusting that the Government of the United States, as the protector of the Cherokees, in its kindness, will extend to our distressed absentee people the hand of humanity and compassion, we take great pleasure in assuring the Government that the Cherokee people are now more united in sentiment and brotherly feeling toward each other than they have been for the last fifty years, and it is our earnest hope that our whole people soon may be gathered together in their own country, that they may strive to promote their happiness and prosperity, and to elevate themselves in the scale of civilization, refinement and religion, with other enlightened people, and to cultivate peaceful relations with the Government of the United States.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

LEWIS DOWNING,

Principal Chief Cherokee Nation.

H. D. REESE,

Chairman Cherokee Delegation.

Hon. N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

A.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT INDIAN AFFAIRS,
FORT SMITH, ARKANSAS, January 10, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a communication from J. P. Davis, assistant and acting chief of the southern Cherokee Indians, upon the subject of removing the destitute southern Cherokees, who now are in the State of Texas and in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, to their homes in the Canadian district in the Cherokee nation.

Prior to the receipt of this communication I had heard that these people were in a very helpless and destitute condition—many of them women and children, without any means of subsistence or transportation. I have conversed with intelligent Choctaws and Chickasaws and others, who profess to be well acquainted with their condition, and they all give substantially the same statement. I am advised that there are delegates from the southern Cherokees and from the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations now in Washington, who, no doubt, could give you satisfactory information on this subject. I am informed that these destitute people are located at different points in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and in Rusk county, Texas; that there are about four hundred in Texas, who are destitute and unable to move themselves; and that it is about four hundred miles from there to their homes in the Cherokee nation; that there are about fifteen hundred of these destitute people in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and that it would average about one hundred and seventy-five miles from where they now are to their homes in the Cherokee nation. It is represented to me that the most convenient point at which these people could be delivered, in order to reach their homes, would be at or near Webber's Falls, Canadian district, in the Cherokee nation, on the Arkansas river. These people are so widely scattered, it would take time and trouble to collect them together and remove them to their own country, and their deplorably destitute and suffering condition requires that whatever the Government will do in the premises should be done as soon as practicable. I do not feel at liberty to act in the matter, either as to furnishing them subsistence or removing them; I therefore submit the subject to your consideration and advisement.

Your obedient servant,
W. BYERS,
Superintendent Indian Affairs.

Hon. LEWIS BOGGS,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

Statement showing the number of absentee Cherokees to be removed to their homes in the Cherokee nation, and subsisted; also probable cost of the same.

Estimated number to be removed and subsisted	1,600
Estimated number of miles to be traveled in removal	175
Estimated number of days required to remove them	60
Estimated number of wagons and teams required to remove them, allowing ten persons to one wagon	100
Estimated number of days during which they should be subsisted after reaching home	100

COSTS AND EXPENSES.

For hire of one hundred wagons at five dollars per day for sixty days, the time required for removal	$50,000
For commutation of rations during the period of removal, sixty days, for one thousand persons, at forty cents per day each	24,000
For commutation of rations for one thousand persons, at forty cents each per day, for one hundred days, at the time during which these Cherokees should be subsisted after reaching home	40,000

Total amount required..... $94,000

Mr. HENDERSON. It will be observed that the Department estimated $75,000. I cut it down to $20,000, because I believed $75,000 was an enormous sum for the purpose; I did not believe that it ought to be appropriated, and a subsequent part of the communication shows very clearly the reason why it ought to be cut down. They estimated for removing the Indians in wagons, which is totally unnecessary. They can remove themselves much more easily and cheaply. All that will be necessary will be subsistence during the period of removal. Now, if it be true that there is a large number of Cherokees absent from their homes, it is quite essential that they should return, and the only question is whether the money should be paid out of the Treasury or paid out of the Cherokee fund. Something, I apprehend, ought to be done for the purpose of furnishing supplies during the time of removal. However, the Senator from Iowa is much more familiar with these matters than I am, and ought to speak with a larger degree of knowledge on the subject.

Mr. HARLAN. I know that the chairman of the committee would not recommend an amendment that he did not think right; but there are Cherokees scattered all around; there is a large number of them in North Carolina, and a few of them scattered in nearly all the southern States. If we enter on the system of going around and gathering up these fugitive Indians I do not see any end to it. Besides, these Cherokees who are now in the Indian country are rich, and they are selling their vast domain to other Indians in large tracts by a provision contained in the treaty made with them in 1866. When they finish those sales, as they will doubtless do before we get all the Indians out of Kansas and Nebraska down to the Indian country, they will be the richest people in the world. They have a regular legislature and courts and a regular government, and if they desire to make an appropriation out of their own funds to aid their absent people to return, it may be well enough for them to do it; but they have the power to do it without any assistance from this Government, and I doubt very much if the suggestion made by the Senator could be legally adopted to make an appropriation to be paid out of their funds. The treaties require any money due them from this Government to be paid over to their government authorities, and we have no legal right, as it seems to me, to divert it without their consent. I do not think this Government can enter into a system of this kind. It might be very humane to undertake this work; but I see no end to it, and it never has been undertaken before, to go around and gather up fugitive Indians in the Indian country, to take them from one location in the Indian country to another, when the Indians are wealthy and able to take care of themselves. If these were poor Indians, if they had nothing, if they were totally dependent on the charity of the national Government, or if they were hostile Indians, and it became necessary to remove them in order to prevent depredations, it would commend itself doubtless to a majority of the Senate; but there are no such reasons for this appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first clause of the amendment. The clause was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the second clause of the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after line fifteen hundred and sixty-seven: To pay expenses of two commissioners appointed to appraise Cherokee neutral lands, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $4,550, to be refunded from sales of said lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was after line fifteen hundred and eighty to insert:

For completing the construction of irrigating canal on the Colorado reservation in Arizona, $84,500.

For the maintenance of Indians brought by the military to the Colorado reservation, and kept there, $20,000.

For expenses of removing Shoshones, Bannocks, Snakes; and other strolling bands of Indians in Idaho, to Fort Hall reservation, and for their support for one year thereafter, $25,000.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask for an explanation of the first item of this amendment:

For completing the construction of irrigating canal on the Colorado reservation in Arizona, $84,500.

It is a large sum, but doubtless there is some reason for it, possibly a sufficient reason.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have in my hand the estimate of the Department on the subject. The Senate will remember that some years ago there was an attempt made to conduct water to this Colorado reservation from the Colorado river. It became apparent that agriculture could not be carried on there with any degree of success without irrigation, and a scheme was adopted to conduct a canal some twenty-five or thirty miles to the reservation; and an appropriation was made several years ago of $50,000 to construct that canal. I know nothing in regard to it except the statement of the superintendent and the agent upon the reservation. The Department says:

"For completing the construction of irrigating canal on the Colorado reservation in Arizona, &c., $84,600.

"This item is omitted in bill. The work on this canal referred to in this item has been commenced and is being pushed forward as fast as possible. When completed it will be about thirty miles long, and capable of irrigating several thousand acres of good tillable land. If the appropriation is not made, the money already expended in the work will have been of no benefit. This, however, is not the most urgent reason for continuing the work to completion; there are several thousand Indians now on the reservation; they are assisting in digging the canal, with the expectation, from promises made to them, that it will be completed, and that they will be started in farming operations. Should the work now stop no white man would dare remain on the reservation. They (the Indians) are in the habit of killing persons who fail to prove what they say; and the reservation might as well be broken up and the Indians left to return to their former habits.

"Superintendent Dent is confident, if the appropriation is made, that the work can be completed this year, and that the Indians, after raising their first crops, will be able to subsist themselves."

This reservation is on the Colorado river in Arizona. We have in this bill made an appropriation of only two dollars per head for the Indians in Arizona. I think myself the appropriation ought to be larger, though we have increased it largely beyond what the House of Representatives allowed. The House in their bill allowed $35,000, and we have increased it to $70,000. The number of Indians in Arizona is about thirty-five thousand, making only two dollars per head. There was an attempt a few years ago to concentrate the Indians in Arizona, who have been hostile to a very large extent, upon this Colorado reservation. A great deal of difficulty has existed during the last six months with the Indians in Arizona. They were all declared hostile by military edict, except those who were on the Colorado reservation, and war was waged until General McDowell issued an order stopping it. The attempt is now to concentrate them all or as large a number as can possibly be obtained to go on the Colorado reservation, which I am told is worthless. Mr. Dent says it is utterly worthless, unless this irrigating canal shall be completed. I, like the Senator from Iowa, thought it was a very large sum; it struck me with astonishment at first; but on examination I find that all the officials concur in saying that it is essential. From all the information I can get the $50,000 already spent on the canal will be entirely lost unless we go on with the work. The question is whether we shall abandon the reservation and abandon the $50,000 we have put into the work, or whether we shall go on in a little farther. That is all.

Mr. CONNESS. It ought to be known to the Senate that there has been an Indian war maintained in Arizona for many years, and that we have now a very large number of our standing Army there. I think there are not less than four regiments in Arizona. The cost of maintaining them and keeping up the war that has been carried on there is very great.

It has cost a great many million dollars. The order to which the Senator from Missouri has referred was one issued by a sub-commander; and but for the judicious management of General McDowell, commanding the department, there would have been very heavy and extraordinary expenditures there. The expenditures are very heavy at best, the most that can be done. Mr. Dent, the present superintendent, is personally known to many of the Senators. I know him very well. No better man could be put there possibly. He has a field now carried on by irrigation amounting to some seventeen hundred acres, very successfully cultivated by the Indian labor. Although this is a single appropriation may seem large, yet it is but a small item compared to the gross expenditures that are constantly going on for trying to maintain peace with Indians by the application of force to them. No better appropriation than this can be made; no higher economy can be afforded than its adoption.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to this appropriation, although it seems large, I think it is wise economy on the part of the Government to make it. It will test the question whether the Colorado valley, which is a very important valley in Arizona, is really to be a valley where there can be a large amount of cultivation. The evidences are that it has been cultivated in some very distant age, because there are the remains of old acequias up and down the valley; and perhaps it was once the site of a very populous people. If it should be proved by the expenditure of this money that that valley is capable of irrigation, we may, perhaps, show that Arizona, notwithstanding what we have heard of it at the present time, is capable of great production in an agricultural way.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator that there is no question in regard to the capacity of that land at all, if you only give it water; it is a mere question of getting water.

Mr. COLE. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs what tribe or tribes are gathered on this reservation that it is proposed to irrigate, and what number of Indians are there, if he has any information on that head? There are several tribes of Indians in Arizona that are friendly and cultivating the ground in a very creditable manner; but as a general rule in that Territory the white people are on the reservation and the Indians have the country. The military authorities, though pretty strong, are unable to control the Apaches of that country, and perhaps a portion of Comanches sometimes visit that Territory. The expenses that the military department have incurred in that Territory have been exceedingly great; and I regret that the military department has not been more successful in quelling the hostile Indians. If these irrigating operations are to benefit a very considerable number of the Indians there and keep them quiet, certainly there could be no better disposition made of that amount of money. I do not know myself what tribe this is; whether the Yumas, or Pikes, or Maricopas, or what tribes are upon this reservation.

Mr. HOWARD. The amendment speaks of the completion of a certain irrigating canal. I beg to inquire whether appropriations of money have been made by Congress for the construction of such canals? Is the chairman of the Indian Committee able to answer the question?

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not hear the question.

Mr. HOWARD. The question is whether there have been appropriations by Congress for the construction of irrigating canals in Arizona?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; for the purpose of building this canal an appropriation was made in 1866-67 of $50,000. I hold in my hand a communication from Mr. Dent, superintendent of Indian affairs there, under date of August 5, 1867, in which he asks for this appropriation to complete the canal. We have already invested in the canal $50,000, and it now becomes necessary, it seems, to abandon the work or make an additional appropriation. It is like a great many other public works. When we have appropriated what we supposed was sufficient originally it turns out that it is necessary to make much larger appropriations. And I cannot promise the Senate that it will not be necessary to make another appropriation in this case. I shall make no promise about it. All I can say is that the officers in authority say they can complete the work for that amount of money, and it is the estimate. There are a large number of Indians in Arizona, as I have just stated, thirty-five thousand; and the proposition now is to get all of them on this reservation or as many as it is possible to get there.

Mr. HOWARD. Is the canal constructed on the Indian reservation?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; the water is to be conducted a distance of thirty miles. It takes a canal or ditch thirty miles in length in order to get the water.

Mr. HOWARD. It strikes me that this is a very anomalous appropriation. Here is an Indian reservation selected, as I presume, by the Indians themselves or by their friends, for their residence and their comfort; and it so happens that in order to make it comfortable and productive to the Indians, the United States are obliged to make large appropriations of money to construct irrigating canals, solely for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state to the Senator that at the time the reservation was established it was very well known that in order to carry on agricultural operations with any degree of success it was necessary to irrigate it, and an estimate was then made of $100,000, but Congress appropriated only half that amount, $50,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, Mr. President, I do not see any propriety in appropriating for such an object as this, and I think the sooner we put an end to it the better. Nobody can see the termination of this style of expenditure. We appropriate this year over $80,000, as required by this amendment, to complete irrigating canals in a country, which, according to the information that I receive, is little better in some portions of it than an arid desert; and to what extent these measures will go it is impossible to foresee. We shall be called upon from year to year to add to the amount of money which we are thus laying out by way of experimenting for the benefit of the Indians. It will exhaust in the end nobody can tell what amount; and I think in the present feeble state of the Treasury, we may well pause in prosecuting this experiment. Let us see at all events whether the $50,000 which have already been expended have been of the slightest benefit even to the Indians. The experiment has been going on now some two or three years, as I understand. It must be that by this time the officers in charge there are able to give us some information as to the fruits of the experiment. I am opposed to indulging this sort of experiment with irrigating canals in the Indian country and on Indian soil.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say to my friend from Michigan that the building of a canal for the purposes of irrigation is not an experiment at all. If he lived in the State that I represent in part here he would understand it all. Many of these canals are built in that State by private enterprise, the water being used for the benefit of both mining and agricultural purposes, at the expense, some of them, of $1,000,000. There are not probably less than $10,000,000 of that work in the State of California.

Mr. HOWARD. All done for the benefit of private individuals?

Mr. CONNESS. Exactly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from California whether there are any engineer's reports about the work that has already been done, and what information we have on the subject?

Mr. CONNESS. I answer the Senator that it does not take a great deal of engineering to build a canal of that kind. Any man with a common level can build such a canal, giving it about an inch or three quarters of an inch fall. Then it is dug, and a portion of it is flumed. It is not a work of engineering to any extent. It is very commonly done. It is a question here on this reservation whether we shall ship via San Francisco, California, produce, at a cost of perhaps seven cents a pound, or enable the Indians by their own labor to raise what they consume. The land is there, and is rich; but, as my friend says, it is arid; during one half of the year the rains do not fall; but the water is by in the Colorado river, and can be brought there. The land is there, the labor is there, and there is no way so cheap to provision the Indians and take care of them as to furnish them the means of labor and water in this manner.

Mr. HOWARD. It seems that it comes to this: that the United States are really supporting the Indians on that reservation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not by any means; they support themselves.

Mr. HOWARD. We are supporting them by way of expending money to enrich and fructify their soil, thus enabling them to make a living out of the soil. I take it that is a contribution to the support of the Indians directly.

Mr. CONNESS. What else do you do anywhere?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know that the United States are in the habit of appropriating money simply for the support of the Indians. It is very true that we reserve lands for Indians in our treaties with them, and the Indians go upon those reservations, and there, by hunting and fishing, or by cultivating corn and other grains, support themselves. It is also true that as part of the consideration for cessions of land made to us under Indian treaties we pay the Indians annuities from year to year to enable them to live. But according to this plan these Indians are mere dependents on the Government; they are mere paupers, having not the means of supporting themselves on that spot. Now, had we not better, in order to simplify the whole proceeding, take these Indians quietly, and put them in some region of country where they will be able to support themselves either by agriculture or by their own habits of fishing and hunting? I am opposed to this appropriation of public money for the benefit of private persons as such. This case cannot be distinguished from an appropriation of money for the support of A, B, C, and D in any other part of the country.

Mr. CONNESS. My friend is opposed to aiding the Indians to build a canal as a means of living; but he is not opposed to the bill that was introduced here by himself or his colleague to make a grant of land, which is equal to a grant of money, for building a canal in Michigan for commercial purposes.

Mr. HOWARD. That is a public work.

Mr. CONNESS. Is not this?

Mr. HOWARD. It is not; because we do not support Indians out of the public purse.

Mr. CONNESS. Why, Mr. President, it is a question, as the honorable Senator states it, as to whether we shall feed these Indians or enable them to feed themselves; but a canal built in Michigan is a public work, and a canal built in Arizona is a private work! There is no such distinction.

Mr. HOWARD. Are these irrigating canals navigable waters?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, Mr. President, they may be made navigable.

Mr. HOWARD. Are they made navigable?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir, sometimes they are made navigable. They are made to transport lumber very frequently. That is a commercial purpose. There is a bill reported now to this body from the Committee on Public Lands to enable a company to build such a canal, by the aid of a grant of public lands, in the Territory of New Mexico; and such grants must be made. These arteries are the life of these countries where they have a dry and a rainy season, but principally a dry season.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is this canal in Arizona navigable?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; I apprehend not. This canal will be used for agricultural purposes. These canals are used in all such countries; they are used in Spain and Italy.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend from Michigan should bear in mind the difference between our Indian relations in all those countries we acquired from Mexico and what they are in other cases where we have acquired land from Indian tribes. When we acquired these territories from Mexico we adopted the Mexican law, which did not acknowledge the title to the land to be in the Indians. We have had no treaty with these Indians, and about thirty-five thousand of them are roaming over this Territory of Arizona. Unfortunately for us we have been in a state of war with these Indians a considerable portion of time. We have now four regiments in Arizona struggling with these Indians and trying to keep the peace—I do not mean the Indians on the reservation, but other Indians—costing us undoubtedly $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. HOWARD. Do I understand the honorable Senator from Wisconsin to say that there was any difference between the principles of the Government of Spain in regard to the rights of soil on the new continent and those of England?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly, in relation to dealing with the Indian tribes.

Mr. HOWARD. As to the right of soil?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We have always, inheriting the common law of England, treated the Indian as if he had a right in the soil, and we have made treaties with him by which he has ceded his land. Of course, however, we only acknowledge in him a possessory right, claiming on our part the preemption right, the exclusive right to purchase of the Indian. All that did not exist under the laws of Mexico, and the relations which they bore to the Indian tribes were very different.

While the military are at work in Arizona trying to keep the peace and reduce the Indians to a state of quiet, as a part of a policy of endeavoring to have peace in Arizona, the Government has sought to establish this reservation. This reservation is in the valley of the Colorado, where the ground is very rich, but you can produce nothing unless you water the ground, and the only way to get water is by conducting this canal around the base of the highlands just outside the valley, and carrying a ditch around for twenty or thirty miles, and then the water can be spread over the valley, and the greatest crops can be raised in that valley. It is a very rich, hot, and fertile valley. I have no doubt that cotton can be produced there, and sugar can be produced there. Now, this expenditure of $80,000, to build this acequia for the purpose of getting these Indians to work on the ground, and raise something to live upon, is a mere bagatelle when you consider what you are spending every day there in our military operations. We must deal with Indians in one of two ways: we must either deal with them in the peaceable way, have peace with them, or fight them and kill them. It is much more expensive to fight and kill them off than it is to try and induce them to go on reservations, and become enabled to support themselves, we aiding them and doing something to their support also. That is the real truth of the situation, as I understand it.

Mr. HOWARD. All this is based on the assumption which remains yet to be established, that the Indians thus provided for will cease to be rovers, that they will cease to be mere hunters and fishermen and tribes of nomads.

Mr. CONNESS. We have proved that.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; that remains to be proved. I do not believe it. I do not believe that these wild rovers of the desert of Arizona will go to work and earn a living for themselves on any soil, however rich you may make it by irrigating canals, which are navigable sometimes according to the honorable Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend not permit that portion of them who are willing to live so, to live so, and will he not aid them in doing it?

Mr. HOWARD. I should want to ascertain in the first place how large a portion were willing to do so. I do not believe one out of a hundred will put his hand to the plow or the hoe, or addict himself to agriculture in such a degree as to support himself or his family. It has not been the character and history of the Indian tribes to any degree, either northern or southern. There are some exceptions, I know; but the Indian character remains the same that it was two hundred years ago substantially. He subsists by hunting and fishing, and he despises labor because he regards it as degrading. That is the universal character of the Indian tribes wherever you find them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I agree with the honorable Senator that some of the tribes of Arizona are as he describes, the Apaches, for instance; but in relation to other tribes in Arizona the Senator is entirely mistaken. There are the Pimas, the Zuñis, and there are the Pueblo Indians that are living there, who are living in the same places now where they were living when the Spaniards first discovered the country, and have been more staid and more settled in their habits of life than our own people are. These very classes of Indians exist in Arizona. It is true that the Apaches partake of the wild character the Senator describes; it is more difficult to tame them, I admit; but even some of the Apaches have been brought upon reservations. I have seen one band of Apaches upon a reservation in New Mexico. You must either chase and hunt them down like wolves and kill and destroy them or induce them to go upon reservations. I will say to my honorable friend that I have no doubt if you would send a commission with a few boxes of tobacco and with something with which to feed even the wildest Indians of Arizona, for one hundredth part of what it will cost to fight them with your armies you could persuade them to settle down in peace and you could make friends of them all. If you will feed them, if you will give them tobacco and make them some presents, you can make friends with them and they will stay anywhere you desire them to stay as long as you feed them.

Mr. HOWARD. And their friendship will last just as long as you feed them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very likely it will last as long as you feed them and give them tobacco. But how much less expensive is that than it is to undertake to fight them with bayonets and bullets and chase them over these wild plains, where you can hardly find them to fight them, and where it costs millions upon millions of dollars? I think the peaceable way of dealing with the Indian tribes is by far the most economical and by far the most honorable, for I do not think there is much honor to be gained in Indian warfare.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from California [Mr. Cole] asked me what Indians were upon this reservation. I have been unable to lay my hands on the last report, the report of Mr. Dent, the present superintendent; but I have before me the prior report made by Mr. Leihy, the former superintendent, under date of October 2, 1866. He there states the Indians upon the reservation, being the entire tribe of the Yumas and Mojaves and portions of other tribes, and he goes on to state how they were getting along, and he states in detail the productions for the past year. I cannot state how many Indians are upon the reservation, but my information is some twenty-five hundred or three thousand at present. General Gregg, it will be remembered by the Senator from California especially, during the last fall issued an order against all the Indians in Arizona not found on the reservation, declaring them hostile and giving permission to the troops to kill them wherever found. Large numbers of Indians, of course, were forced against their will to go to the reservation under these circumstances. General McDowell, in a letter reviewing the order of General Gregg, declares that it is impossible for the Indians to live on the reservation without irrigation.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to ask the honorable Senator one question. It seems that this irrigating canal has been in progress for some two or three years.

Mr. CONNESS. No. The appropriation was made in 1866-67, and this is 1868.

Mr. HOWARD. Say two years.

Mr. CONNESS. One year.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well, one year, or six months, or three months, if the honorable Senator desires to narrow it down. The question to which I ask an answer, if it can be furnished, is this: this canal is made for the benefit of the Indians in order to enable them to live by agriculture. Now, can the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs tell us whether any of the Indians have been employed in making this canal, whether they have worked at it?

Mr. CONNESS. Nobody else has.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. I presume such is the fact; but the Senator must be aware that the Indians themselves when at work on the canal will require some pay. It is not to be expected that an Indian of one tribe for the benefit of all the tribes will go to work day by day for a year upon a canal when that canal is equally for the benefit of other tribes to be congregated on the reservation for the next ten years hence.

Mr. HOWARD. Why not, if he is paid out of money we appropriate for his labor?

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course he will have to be paid for that labor. He will not work without pay. We must pay for his work on the canal; he must have his subsistence in some way.

Mr. HOWARD. My question is based on the supposition that if the Indian works on the canal he is paid out of the public money for his labor. I suppose he would not work for nothing more than the white man.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose so; and hence it requires an appropriation, or else the canal cannot be made. The Senator from Michigan says that no such appropriations are made for anybody else except Indians in this country. Does the Senator remember the fact that the Indian tribes have been driven from civilization, have been driven back from year to year? They have been driven from the Senator's State as much as from any other State in the Union. This process commenced with Massachusetts, and from Massachusetts it has continued through my State and through the Senator's State; and now there is but little left for the Indian to occupy. He has been driven into a country where the soil needs irrigation or else he cannot subsist himself. The Senator, after having participated, as I have participated and as all of us have participated, in driving him back into a barren country where it is utterly impossible for any human being to live almost, denies even the bare means necessary to make it fertile. That is the truth of the matter, and the Senator need not attempt to ignore it. We all know and we all feel that such is the fact; that we have seized upon the Indians' land. The civilized world knows it, and we might as well admit it. The only way we can escape the odium of our position is by doing something for him.

There are portions of the Territory of Arizona where these Indians might live; but we have set aside this reservation for them and required them to go there. It is necessary to have irrigation in order to make the reservation productive. We have required the Indians to settle on the reservation, and ever and anon military orders go out that all Indians in the Territory—no matter where they may have lived heretofore, no matter what portion of the country they may have occupied—that all Indians not found within a given time on that reservation, whether they can subsist themselves there or not, shall be declared hostile.

After this policy has been pursued for a couple of centuries of driving the Indians from the East into the middle States, and from the middle States to the western States, and from the rich and fertile lands of the western States, the valleys of the Ohio, of the Kentucky, of the Mississippi, and of the Missouri rivers, will the Senator pretend to say that they ought to be put upon the same footing with our own people; that because we do not appropriate annually dollars from the Treasury for the benefit of our own people therefore it ought not to be done for the Indians? Why, Mr. President, we do appropriate for our own people, and appropriate largely. We appropriate lands, and we appropriate otherwise. But these Indians are not in the attitude of our own people, because wherever their interests come in conflict with ours we know—the history of the last two centuries demonstrates—that the right of the Indian must yield to the white settlers. Why, sir, there is not an Indian reservation now in one of the western States that is coveted by the white man that the Indian will not have to leave in a few months. You have treaties pending before you for the removal of all the Indians from the State of Kansas. I can remember in my boyhood when the present State of Kansas was entirely covered by Indians, and there was not a white man in it.

Now, it becomes necessary that he shall be removed. Why? Simply because the white man wants his land. He may have the best land in the West; but the Indian must go away whether he wills or not. Where do we send him? We send him to a less fertile country; we send him further West into the boundless prairies, made so by the want of water, where it scarcely ever rains. We send him from that region of country where the clouds go charged with rain into a region of country that is barren because it is not fertilized by the rains of heaven. We require him to go; and in order to subsist, he must have irrigation; and now it is proposed to deny upon this occasion the poor pittance that is asked for irrigating purposes.

Mr. President, it is not worth while to compare our people with the Indian. He has been mistreated; we all admit and know it; and that mistreatment is continued to-day. Why, sir, but this afternoon it was demonstrated to you that a tribe of Indians in Oregon doing well, being located upon a reservation upon the seashore, being located there permanently as they supposed, having built their huts and having entered into agriculture, were treated how? In a few years it was discovered that there was an oyster-bed in the ocean, and the President was called upon to open up that particular portion of the reservation to the settlement of the white man, and it was done. Why? In consequence of the discovery of the oyster-bed, and the whites immediately rushed upon the reservation, seized the Indian habitations and drove them back; and it now becomes essential to pass a provision to pay them for damages done by the settlers. The Senator from Iowa, who was then Secretary of the Interior, tells us that he did not know that this oyster-bed, which was a mine of wealth within itself, had been discovered. That was true, but the gentlemen upon the seashore I apprehend did know that it had been discovered; and this action of the Government was sought and obtained in perfect ignorance by it of that discovery.

So it has been, and so it will be with the rights of the Indians. Mr. President, I postpone the remarks that I might make in relation to the various injuries and wrongs inflicted on this injured race. I am very well aware that when you ask for an appropriation that looks large legislators shudder; but as has been said by a great many Senators this evening, it is best, it is cheapest in the end, to make the requisite appropriation, and to do right so far as we possibly can. Why, sir, in this Territory of Arizona during the last twelve months I have not any doubt that the Government has expended from ten to fifteen million dollars. Is the Senator aware that a war was carried on there for six months, a war of the most devastating character, and one which would have been raging to-day but for the active and direct interference of General McDowell; and the country owes him a debt of gratitude for it. General Gregg made a mistake, he committed a blunder, as a great many of our generals do. Instead of expending from fifteen to twenty or thirty millions annually, as we have been doing for the last six or eight years in trying to subjugate Indians, when we cannot subjugate them, if we would expend a few hundred thousand dollars in a peaceful and honorable way, doing partial justice when we cannot do full justice for our many wrongs to them, we should be more honorable ourselves, and we should have less trouble with the Indians.

You vote large sums of money to the quartermaster's department of the Army. Why? Because the Secretary of War makes his estimates, and you have it to do. You have a large Army. The Democratic party on this floor tell us so every day, and admonish us that that Army ought to be reduced. How can it be reduced? You dare not do it until you get rid of Indian difficulties. We had an Indian war all over the plains, upon the mountains, and up on Powder river in Montana, in Idaho, in Arizona, in New Mexico, and upon the plains of Kansas, last year. How was it quelled? Millions and millions of money had already been expended; property had been burned; stage-coaches had been seized; passengers had been killed; the border settlers had been scalped; their horses had been run off; trains had been seized upon the plains, and hundreds of horses and mules taken. How was all that stopped? It was done by presenting before the Indians a few peace commissioners who reasoned with them, and by expending perhaps $200,000. General Sherman, who had been of the opinion that there was no other way to manage this matter except war, and war to the knife, has become a convert to the peace doctrine. He has become perfectly satisfied that it is less expensive to the country and more honorable to the nation, and so will it be with every man who has any personal experience on this question.

It is needless for us in this Chamber to attempt this penny-wise and pound-foolish policy. It will not do to adopt it. It does not do in individual transactions, and it does much worse in national legislation. Let us be honorable to the Indian. If we do not provide for his subsistence, let us at least, since we have driven him from fertile lands to those that are barren, furnish a ditch that will enable him to carry water to his reservation in order that he may subsist himself.

The Senator from Michigan is mistaken if he supposes that many of the tribes are not self-sustaining, even in the arid and barren and sterile country of Arizona. I can state to him that from thirty-five to fifty thousand bushels of wheat were raised last year by an Indian tribe in Arizona. Corn was raised also. It is not a very good country for raising Indian corn, but wheat can be raised in large quantities. This reservation we ourselves by legislation have set apart for these Indians. We did not ask their consent; we did not make any treaty with them; but we staked out our own boundary in a barren plain in its present condition, and issued an edict to the Indian that he should abandon the home of his childhood and live upon this land which we fixed for him. We did not ask his consent. We did not ask him to go, but we said to him "you shall go;" we fixed the boundaries so as to put this reservation outside of the routes of railroad lines of travel. When we have done that, let us not complain of the necessary expenses of making it fit for the residence of the Indians, but let us meet those expenses like men, and let us do whatever is necessary to give honor and credit to the nation and do honor and credit to ourselves. If we do this, in the course of a few years these Indians will be congregated upon the reservation, and I have no doubt they will be self-sustaining.

But, sir, I have been led into these remarks by the very singular remarks of the Senator from Michigan. I have no more interest in this matter than others. If the Senate prefer that the Indians should roam over the Territory of Arizona, that General Gregg should continue this war, and that the military authorities should be in antagonism about it, and that thousands should be killed as heretofore, that the peace policy should be abandoned, and that we should be compelled in future to sustain and support these Indians in order to keep them peaceable, instead of making this reservation blossom as the rose, and thus enable them to support themselves, then let us deny the appropriation.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a few words to say in reply to the spirited speech of the honorable Senator from Missouri. The honorable Senator from Missouri, instead of confining himself to the propriety of making the appropriation of $84,000 contemplated in the amendment, has extended his remarks so far as to embrace the whole subject of our Indian affairs. And in the course of his observations he repeats what is so very frequently said by a certain class of persons, that the Indians have been treated with injustice and have been driven from their old homes; and he states that the Government of the United States has made itself odious by reason of the Indians being driven from their homes and the graves of their fathers. Sir, this is a very romantic view to take of the subject. It will answer very well in a newspaper poem, or in a novel of yellow cover; but in point of fact there is no reality and substantially no truth in it. Have the Indians been driven from their homes? Who has driven them, and when and in what way? Has not the Government of the United States purchased of the Indians, for prices satisfactory to the tribes, all the lands that we have acquired from the Indians? Did they not make purchase wherever there was Indian land in the Northwestern Territory? Did they not pay the Indians every cent which they stipulated to pay? Did they not give them reservations according to their own choice and according to their own notions, and have they not paid them the purchase price of those lands and the annuities which from time to time have fallen due from the Government to the Indians?

Sir, no such reproach can rest on the Government of our country as having driven the Indian from his home; that is, of having seized his lands unjustly, for that is the language which the Senator from Missouri used very frequently in the course of his remarks. No, sir; it is nothing but mere romance. The great difficulty in the case lies here: the Indian is a savage; his habits are those of a savage; he will not addict himself to industrial pursuits; he despises and contemns labor, which is the great vocation and the great destiny and the great glory of the white man and of the civilization of the white man. The white man needs the Indian lands for what? For hunting and fishing and roving and sporting? No, sir. The white man needs the land for the purpose of cultivation and use, in order to promote the arts of civilization and the prosperity of the country. The Indian has an opposite view. He uses the land only for the purposes of hunting and fishing and roving. That is the general fact about it. Now, the Indian sees as clearly as the white man that the habits of the former are such as to render it impossible, or extremely difficult and unnatural, to maintain his position in the midst of the white men and to pursue, in the midst of white civilization, those nomadic habits which have always distinguished him and his race. The two things cannot subsist together. It is contrary to nature; it is contrary to the interests of both the parties.

So much for driving the Indian from his home, seizing his land, and thus bringing odium upon the Government of the United States! That is a tale that has been told in many and many a Fourth of July oration. It has drawn tears, also, from the eyes of the benevolent of both sexes for one hundred and fifty or two hundred years; and the affected listener has supposed when he or she has listened to the eloquent oration or the touching and pathetic sermon, that their country has really done enormous and almost unpardonable wrong to the Indian tribes. Sir, it is all a romance. Undoubtedly acts of injustice have been committed by white men toward the Indian tribes; but when those acts shall be numbered up and set down in the Great Book upon which both parties are to be judged, by the side of the innumerable volumes of crime and injustice committed by the Indian upon the white man, it is easy to see where the balance will be. And the fact accrues out of the other fact that the habits of the two races are utterly irreconcilable, that the white man is the more inclined to the arts of peace than the Indian. The Indian is a warrior; he values human life very little; his faith is of very little value; and when you speak of breaches of treaty between the white and the Indian you will discover, if you scan it closely, that in most cases the violation of treaty has been on the part of the Indian tribe. I appeal for the truth of this to the history of this country and to the history of every negotiation with the Indian tribes since the discovery of the continent.

I would treat the Indians with justice; I would pay him that which is his due; I would not encroach upon his rights; but I would enforce his treaty stipulations both for his good and for ours; and when an Indian tribe has wantonly committed a breach of treaty, where there has been a murder or a series of murders committed upon white men by Indians in violation of their treaty, I would as soon punish an Indian tribe by launching upon them the bolts of war as I would against a foreign nation whose citizens had committed the same outrages. There can be no distinction or difference in principle between the two cases.

Now, one word further as to this amendment. I am opposed to the lavish expenditures of money contemplated by it. This is a far off, distant country, where it is impossible that this work can be well understood or well inspected. It looks to me a little as if the original appropriation had in view some rich contracts for the construction of this irrigating canal. I do not remember the discussion which may have taken place upon the bill in the Senate; but I can very well imagine that the Senate was assured that $50,000 would be abundantly sufficient to construct the contemplated irrigating canal. Who is doing it we do not know; how far the work has progressed we do not know.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes we do; we know both.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; we do not know both; at least I do not. I think there has been no report on the subject; no sufficient report. Now, sir, we go on and spend $84,000 more. At the next session of Congress we shall be called upon to appropriate another $84,000, and another, and another, and it is impossible to foresee when these so-called necessities of the Indians who are dependent on this irrigating canal for their support, these roving Indians as they have been called, will end; when the expenditure will be terminated. We are opening a channel through which the Treasury may be depleted, almost exhausted, by way of showing our humanity; and it will stand as a precedent for other schemes of the same kind. That whole country is of the same character, I take it, as this reservation; very little grain can be raised without irrigation; the country is destitute of rain or of fountains of water, destitute of rivers. Where is this thing going to end?

I object to it for another reason, that it is expending the public money for private purposes. If these Indians cannot subsist upon that arid reservation, send them somewhere else. Why did you put them there? Who put them there? Why was this dry desert selected as the home of three or four thousand Indians, more or less, when in a few months afterwards it turns out that it is utterly impossible for them to subsist upon the soil? Who has committed the error that has brought upon us the necessity not only of removing the Indians to this desert, but of making an irrigating canal for the purpose of softening their soil, and enabling them to support themselves by agriculture? Who has committed this blunder? Who has made the mistake? Let us stop it at once. At all events let us suspend this experiment until we have reliable and exact information as to its probable success, and not launch into this scheme of expending the public money in the dark and following it up session after session without knowing what becomes of it or what is done with it or what fruits are reaped from it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, no one can imagine the surprise that this debate has occasioned me. If I could have got the floor by any possibility I would have tried to arrest it when I was a young man, [laughter;] but I was unable to do so. But I desire to protest in a modest way if this is quite right. Why, sir, I have sat here for two days on this bill. All this afternoon we have been voting amendments here, amounting in the aggregate, probably, to a million or two, and it has taken the utmost authority that the Chair could exert to induce members enough to vote to cast the balance between the Senator from Missouri and myself; but this evening we come down here and on this one amendment, only appropriating a little over eighty thousand dollars, an hour and a half has been spent in the most earnest debate that I have listened to in a long time. Now, is this quite right? Of what use is it now to try to save money in this bill, especially to save it in such small sums as $80,000? Of what consequence is it whether this will do the Indians any good or not?

The Senator from California, who ought to know, thinks it is essential to make this appropriation as a military measure; my colleague, who, I am sure, ought to know quite as well, thinks it necessary as a scientific experiment; the Senator from California to reduce the warlike Indians to peace; my colleague to demonstrate the capacities of the Colorado valley. I do not know whether it is necessary on the one account or the other or on either. I really do not think the Senate cares much about it, and I wish we would consent now to take the vote. It will either be adopted or rejected, and that will be the end of that one amendment; then we can come to another. ["Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sprague, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, and Wiley—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Edmunds, Frelighuysen, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Tipton, and Welch—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, McCreery, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Whyte, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in section two, line five, after the word "band," the words "in bulk and in the original package."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section two the following:

And the delivery of all such goods and merchandise, or annuities of any character, shall be made in the presence of a military officer not below the rank of captain, to be detailed for that purpose by the commander of the department in which the delivery shall be made, which officer shall attest by his certificate the receipt thereof; and no receipt by Indians for goods or property to any superintendent or agent shall be valid to discharge such offices unless the same shall be accompanied by the certificate of such military officer, showing that said goods were actually delivered, and are of the quantity and quality stated in the invoice or bill thereof, a copy of which shall be attached to the receipt.

Mr. HARLAN. I doubt the practicability of that amendment. The chairman of the committee has told us during the examination of this bill that there are over seventy Indian agencies. This provides that no goods or money shall be paid to the Indians except in the presence of a military officer of the rank of captain at least. That will require the presence for a considerable period of time of seventy odd officers of the Army at these Indian agencies. It will be perfectly practicable where there is a military post in the vicinity of an Indian agency; but where they are remote from each other, it seems to me to be utterly impossible to carry it into effect. It may be that the members of the committee who have reported this amendment have thought of this difficulty and may know how to obviate it; but it seems to me to be utterly impracticable. If not practicable it would provide an absolute barrier to the fulfillment of our treaty obligations with many of the Indian tribes.

Mr. HENDERSON. In reference to this matter, I became perfectly satisfied last fall that the Indians in a great many respects were defrauded out of their annuities; and my impressions were that if a military officer was required to attest the delivery of the goods, even if it did not in all cases secure perfect honesty in the delivery of the goods, it would make matters much better than they now are. I am not able to say whether the amendment is entirely practicable. I do not know whether a military officer could be obtained conveniently at every point where goods are to be delivered. Perhaps it would be attended with some little difficulty.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator might amend the amendment by inserting the words "when practicable."

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it might be done if there was a military post say within twenty-five or fifty miles of the point of delivery, and by putting in that provision it might be made practicable to a certain extent. My impression is that a good deal of difficulty arises from the fact that Indians believe anyhow that they are defrauded in the delivery of goods, and they have good reason in many cases to believe it. The military and the civil officers are in conflict wherever I have been in reference to Indian matters, and there is a great deal of that conflict existing here, some believing that it would be better to turn over the Indians to the military authorities altogether, and others believing that the civil authorities should retain jurisdiction. I am clearly of opinion that the civil authorities should retain jurisdiction; but at the same time I desire to secure, if possible, perfect integrity in the management of Indian affairs, and I thought that if, where it were practicable to do so, a military officer should be required to attest the delivery of goods, the natural enmity and jealous feeling existing between the two departments would induce a greater degree of honesty in the delivery anyhow.

However, it is a suggestion of my own; I have drawn it up and submitted it to the Senate. If the Senator from Iowa thinks it would be better to limit this requirement, it might be done by inserting the words "where such an officer can be obtained within twenty-five or fifty or one hundred miles," whatever distance may be fixed upon. Military officers can be a great deal better employed in this way than in fighting Indians, and I believe that if this scrutiny into the delivery of goods were required it would be so satisfactory to the Indians as to prevent frauds and to require the attention of the military. That is, we might have them peacefully employed in attesting the delivery of goods instead of hostilely employed in fighting Indians.

Mr. HARLAN. I approve most fully of the honorable Senator's purpose. It would certainly be some guarantee to require these payments to be made in the presence of two officers of different branches of the public service, and I would be willing to accept the amendment with the modification the Senator proposes. But to show how difficult it would be in some instances I may mention that there is a very little fragment of Indians in the State of Iowa, which I have the honor in part to represent here. There is no military post in the State; there is none within some hundreds of miles of the location of these Indians, for they are located very near the center of the State. It would cost nearly as much to send an officer from Washington city to that little fragment of a band as the money that is paid to them would amount to. With the modification the Senator proposes it probably would be practicable, and if so it ought to be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "made" the words "where such officer shall be stationed within fifty miles of the place of delivery."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before that last amendment passes from the consideration of the Senate I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Missouri that perhaps he would arrive at what he desires better if he were to provide that the commanding officer of the district should detail an officer for the purpose when he should find it practicable to do so. If you say "within fifty miles" it may not work well. There may be instances where it would be practicable for the commander to send an officer one hundred and fifty miles. Perhaps there may not be a station within fifty or one hundred miles of the Indians, but if it is left to the commanding officer, whenever he finds it practicable, to detail an officer to attend to it, let it be his duty to do it, and then he will judge of the circumstances.

Mr. CONNESS. In that case I suggest that the provision might be that before the delivery it should be the duty of the agent or superintendent to make an application to the district commander, and that would be of record as a matter of course.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My objection to this proposition would not be on the question whether it is practicable or not. I think the whole thing is vicious. I do not think a military officer ought to supervise payments made by any civil officer—it is not his business to do so. A captain of a company is not a fit man to superintend the payment out of money by a civil officer, or the delivery of property by a civil officer. It is not in the line of his business; and it is a step in a direction that I do not like. I have never made up my mind to any extent at all that Indians ought to be placed under the control and management of the Army. Thus far my judgment has been hostile to the proposition. This is a short step in that direction. I think the Senate had better reject the whole thing on principle.

Mr. HENDERSON. It has been adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Corbett in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana moves to reconsider the vote adopting the last amendment voted on.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope it will not be done.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill as a new section:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $3,500 provided for in the tenth article of the treaty of March 6, 1861, with the Sacs, Foxes, and Iowas, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in the construction of a toll-bridge across the Great Nemaha river, may be applied to the purchase of oxen and agricultural implements, &c., for the use of said Indians, in compliance with their request.

Mr. TIPTON. Before that question is taken I should like to hear from the chairman of the committee why the stipulation of the treaty is not to be carried out in regard to the erection of a bridge over the Great Nemaha; why it is diverted for the purpose specified in the section? The bridging of that stream is a matter of the first importance to my constituents.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Indians say that they do not want a bridge over the Great Nemaha, and that they can have this money expended much more profitably to themselves in another direction, in the purchase of oxen and agricultural implements. They say that if the bridge is built it will inure entirely to the benefit of the whites. They never want to cross the river except in their canoes, and the whites will enjoy the benefit of the appropriation, which should be exclusively enjoyed by the Indians. This proposition is made at the unanimous request, I believe, of all the head men and chiefs of the tribe. They especially desire it, and they do not feel that they ought to be taxed for the construction of a bridge which will be enjoyed by the white men. I know that the Senator's constituents would be very largely benefited, but the Indians cannot see that they themselves will be benefited, and now that white men have entered the country in such large numbers the Indians have come to the conclusion that the whites ought to build a bridge, and leave the benefits of the treaty to inure to them in another direction where it can be exclusively enjoyed by them. They say the bridge will scarcely ever be crossed by them, but the whites will use it almost entirely, and the whites ought to build it if they want it. If the bridge be built by the Indians, the Indians will have a right to charge toll there, and not let the whites cross. They do not wish to keep a toll-bridge there, because they do not know but that they will be compelled to move some of these days, and then they would have to sacrifice their rights in this toll establishment.

Mr. TIPTON. I was not aware of what the language or provision of the treaty was, and therefore I desired information. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $10,356 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to defray the expenses of the Cherokee delegation to Washington, District of Columbia, during the year 1867: Provided, That said sum be refunded to the Treasury of the United States out of that portion of the proceeds of the sale of the Cherokee neutral lands applicable to Cherokee national purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the awards made to Joseph G. Heald and Reuben Wright, under the fifth article treaty of April 23, 1866, with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, the sum of $90,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the sum of $500,000, now to the credit of the Choctaw nation in the Treasury of the United States, placed there in conformity with the tenth and thirteenth articles treaty of June 22, 1855, with the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

Mr. CONNESS. I am told that the questions involved in this amount of appropriation which it is proposed to take from a certain fund and pay to certain parties, are now undergoing special investigation in the House of Representatives as a separate measure. We cannot possibly know sufficiently about the facts to decide this question here. We are called upon to provide for paying $90,000 out of a certain Indian fund, and without knowing much of the facts and circumstances. We are asked to be judges in the case. The case is now undergoing investigation before the House of Representatives as a special question, and I should hope that this provision should not be put upon this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Shall we not be more likely to pass it if we do not know than if we do so?

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator, as Mr. Ward would say, is meaning to be sarcastical to night. I think if he will just simply put his hat out of his hand and sit down here with us we shall be more likely to do our business better than we are now doing it, for we never get along so well without my honorable friend as with him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have heard about as much of Indians as I care to hear to-night.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that this section will not be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am entirely indifferent about this matter. It is no appropriation from the Treasury. It is like a great many other appropriations in this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. It is deciding an Indian question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; it is deciding an Indian question. If the appropriation is made, it comes out of the moneys of the Indians. It is like many other appropriations in the bill. They appear pretty large, but they do not come out of the Treasury of the United States; they come out of the funds that belong to the Indians. Many of these large appropriations are of that character. They are calculated to frighten Senators by their amount, but yet there is nothing in them so far as expense to the Treasury is concerned.

Under a treaty made in 1866 with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians it was provided that a commission should be appointed to investigate the claims of these traders among them, the Choctaws and Chickasaws at the beginning of the war having seized upon their property. A commission was appointed, and they have assessed this amount, and the question now is whether, in accordance with that treaty, we shall make an appropriation to pay them. I believe all parties agree that this amount is due. I know that there is some serious objection to paying it out of the funds that are now in the Treasury to the credit of the Choctaws and Chickasaws; but there is no other way of paying it. It is a treaty stipulation of the Indians that they will pay it, and I know of no other funds to pay it from.

It is true that the Choctaws and Chickasaws have a claim against the Government of $1,800,000; but the Senate is not prepared at present, I apprehend, to make that appropriation. If the Senate will appropriate that money the Indians would much prefer paying it directly from the Treasury; but we do not exactly acknowledge our indebtedness to that extent; and we are not prepared to make the appropriation, and the creditors of the Indians demand this money. I am perfectly indifferent about it. In fact, I believe the attorneys for the Indians object to its being paid, and General Denver this evening informed me that there was some misunderstanding about the amendment. I scarcely know what course to pursue. It was a very late matter. I only saw him to-day in reference to it. He called upon me and said there was some misunderstanding in the other House. My understanding was that it was perfectly agreed upon between the counsel for the Indians and the counsel for Heald and Wright that this money should be paid and paid at once out of the Indian fund. However, the matter is before the Senate. It has been adjudicated, and it is perfectly clear that this amount is due and ought to be paid in some way, and the sooner it is paid, I apprehend, the better.

Mr. CONNESS. I only wish to say in addition that I am informed—I do not pretend, indeed I do not know enough to vote on the question, and therefore I desire it not adopted—that it is made up in part from claims purchased with confederate money, and drafts drawn upon firms that failed, and concocted and made up of various parts of that kind. I hope that we shall not vote upon it in this bill.

Mr. STEWART. One of these gentlemen called upon me with a statement, which I took the trouble to look through, from Governor Boutwell, who had been informed of the facts, and had investigated them. He had been a citizen of Boston. From the statement I saw, the claim is for goods taken by the Choctaws and Chickasaws at the time they rebelled. Of course I do not know anything about the proof in detail except the statement that was then presented. My understanding was that the claim had been examined by a commission.

Now, I have to say this in regard to the Choctaws and Chickasaws: I think our Government was exceedingly liberal in renewing treaty stipulations with them. I do not think we should ever have agreed to pay all that might be found due under former treaties when we renewed our relations with them after the rebellion. I think we treated them with exceeding liberality, such liberality as we treated no other subjects who went into the rebellion. They were placed in a better position; and if this money is really due, as appears to be the case, and there does not appear to be any question as to the amount, I think it ought to be paid. If there is any mistake about it it can be left out in the conference committee, but I hope the amendment will not be abandoned. It can be further considered in conference, if there is any mistake about it, or if it is founded on confederate money or anything of that kind; but the statement of Governor Boutwell looked to me like a very fair statement of the case. This man was there trading, and the Indians took his property, tore down his house, and drove him out of the country. They joined the confederate forces, and he had to leave. If the amount is actually found due, they certainly ought to pay it. If there is any mistake about it, of course it can be left out in the conference.

Mr. RAMSEY. In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from California, I will say that I am told this matter has been before the committee of the House for four months past, and their conclusion is in favor of the claim; but not having been called, they have not had an opportunity to report.

Mr. CONNESS. We do not know that.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am so informed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I had occasion to look into this question when the treaty was under consideration. The Choctaws are not an ordinary tribe of Indians. They are very able men, and in negotiating their treaties they are as sharp in making a bargain as any white men ever have been, I believe. But in making this treaty they make this stipulation by which they agreed to pay Heald and Wright, Massachusetts men, I believe, who were in the Indian country, and who had a large amount of goods there just at the breaking out of the rebellion, and the Indians, when they rebelled, seized their goods. They agreed to pay this money as it should be ascertained by a commission. That clause is in the treaty. Precisely what the commission have found I do not know. That is news to me; but the original basis of the claim was that they agreed to pay for goods that they had seized when they went off into the rebellion, which Heald and Wright, Massachusetts men, had down in the Indian country. If the commission has been fair, and has found the amount fairly—and I know nothing to the contrary—I think it ought to be paid.

The amendment was rejected—ayes eleven, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was an amendment passed over which will now be considered.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in line eleven to strike out "$39,000" and insert "$116,550;" so that the clause will read:

For the pay of superintendents of Indian affairs and of Indian agents, $116,550.

Mr. HOWE. Have you made that calculation?

Mr. HENDERSON. *Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. How much is it?

Mr. HENDERSON. One hundred and sixteen thousand five hundred and fifty dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have some other amendments to offer from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move to amend the bill by adding the following to the first section:

For the purpose of carrying out new treaty stipulations with the northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and for removing them from near Fort Laramie to the new reservation, as agreed by the Indian peace commission, $30,000.

Mr. HOWE. Is that a new section?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is under the new treaty which has just been sent in, and is now pending. I regard the appropriation as absolutely essential.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer another amendment, to insert the following:

For the purpose of clothing and subsisting the Crow Indians of Montana Territory, under provisions of the treaty of 1866, and under the late treaty made by the peace commissioners at Fort Laramie, and for paying expenses for subsistence incurred at Fort Laramie, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer another amendment, to insert the following:

For the purpose of removing to their new reservation the Sioux Indians of the Powder river country, and for subsistence, and to enable them to commence farming, as provided in the new treaty of Fort Laramie, made with the peace commissioners, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer another amendment, to insert after line one hundred and ninety-three the following:

For the Chippewas of Lake Superior, to be expended in the purchase of twine for nets, kettles for making sugar, guns and ammunition, provisions, and material for blankets, clothing, &c., as estimated by the agent of said Indians, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have another amendment, to insert after line seventy of the amendments the following:

For transportation of goods, &c., to the Kiowas, Comanches, Apaches, Cheyennes, and Arapahoes, $12,000.

The Senate will remember that in striking out the clause in the original bill we struck out the transportation, and it was neglected to be inserted, and it is necessary to put it in. I have reduced it, however, from the estimate of $16,000 to $12,000. I think it may be made at that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have another amendment, to insert after the sixth line of the printed amendments the following:

The salary of said last-named superintendent shall be $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have another amendment, to insert the following:

For vaccination of Indians and furnishing vaccine matter, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer another amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That with a view and for the purpose of collecting together under the same government and control the various Indian tribes now in the State of Kansas, in the Indian territory, and on the plains south and west of said State and Territory, including the Osages, Wichitas, Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Apaches, together with such tribes or individual Indians in the State of Texas and in the Territory of New Mexico as may be induced to settle thereon, the following district of country is hereby set apart as a permanent Indian reservation, to wit: all that territory bounded north by Kansas, east by Arkansas and Missouri, south by Texas, and west by the one hundred and first meridian of west longitude; and said territory shall be known as the Territory of Cherokee. And it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be prepared and reported to Congress at his next session such rules and regulations as in his judgment may be proper and efficient for the government and civilization of the Indians to be collected thereon, which rules and regulations, when enacted into law by Congress, shall constitute the form of government for said Territory. Until the repeal or alteration of this section, no authority shall be exercised by any Department officer of the Government looking to the location or settlement of any of the Indians herein referred to upon any lands except those included in the reservation herein described. And the Secretary shall immediately issue orders to all superintendents and agents in charge to give information to the tribes under their control of the passage of this act, and that they encourage said Indians to accept the purposes of the Government as herein indicated. The Secretary, by authority of the President, may also cause treaty stipulations or agreements to be entered into with the tribes referred to, providing for their removal and settlement upon the reservation herein defined, which said agreements or treaties shall not be binding until ratified by the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I should like to hear something about it before it is acted upon. It seems to me that is setting apart a very large amount of country.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is the Cherokee country now.

Mr. STEWART. All of it?

Mr. HENDERSON. Every bit of it—the country of the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. It is the Indian territory.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose it contemplates making more Indian treaties. I am opposed to the whole treaty business, and I believe we should as soon as possible commence legislating for the Indians. I think it is a disgrace to the country to carry on this business of treating with the Indians and removing them from time to time, giving them a large tract of land, and then when civilization gets near them, and they commence to become civilized to some extent, a few of the leading Indians are bribed by the agents or speculators who desire to get the lands, and they are removed from them at enormous expense, the lands bought, and we continue treating with them. It seems to me the sooner we commence the system of legislation and protect them in their rights by legislation the better. I do not believe in these treaties. Many of them are made where there are no tribes, made with irresponsible Indians, and it is a very expensive business.

In my State we have a large number of Indians; but we have no Indian treaties, and I think we get along with the Indians better than in any other part of the United States. In this bill there is $20,000 appropriated for the Indians in Nevada. There are as many Indians in Nevada as there are in Arizona, and I think as many as there are in California.

Mr. COLE. Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART. Perhaps not; but we have many more than there are in Idaho.

Mr. HENDERSON. How many have you?

Mr. STEWART. Nobody knows how many there are; and I suppose nobody knows definitely how many there are in any State or Territory. You can only make an estimate. The wild Indians have not been enumerated anywhere. But it is claimed there are from four to ten thousand Indians there. I cannot tell how many; nobody knows. These estimates are all very vague, particularly with regard to the wild Indians. We get along with $20,000 a year for the Indians in Nevada; but when you pass laws and make treaties, and set apart reservations, you have a large amount of negotiation with irresponsible persons, and much more irresponsible agents.

The great evil of the treaty system is this: we have no means of investigating it. The Committee on Indian Affairs must adopt the reports from the Department, and the Department are informed by Indian agents and speculators who surround the Department. Go there on any occasion and you will see hundreds of them there with their little schemes. It is easy enough for them to make representations and get up their evidence, and there is no means of testing it. If the treaties were discussed in open Senate and in the House, and passed through the committees as other matters are, we should get information. But a treaty comes in in the hot days, and the doors are closed—for what purpose I do not know—and nobody will stay here to hear it, and nobody knows anything about it, and thus enormous abuses have grown up. Committees are imposed upon; the Senate is imposed upon; the Department is imposed upon; and very little good is done to the country by means of these Indian treat-ties. This amendment contemplates future Indian treaties.

It seems to me that this whole Indian business could be transacted for one tenth of the money that is now appropriated. I think a simple plan might be adopted. I would suggest to have no army there and no Indian agents in the country. I would select the very best army officers that the country has; I would have their headquarters in the Indian country, in their towns; and when you wanted an Indian war you could get volunteers over night and have the war disposed of in a couple of days, and that would be the end of it. Keeping an army away in the interior to watch the Indians, and spending millions upon millions for transportation and food, is a useless expense, because they cannot do the work as well as those who are on the ground. The volunteers are the men to dispose of an Indian war under the direction of military men. These military men should also enforce the laws against the whites, make regulations, and have them understood.

As to feeding the Indians, I am opposed to it except upon the same principle that I would feed other poor people. I would make them no promises. If they have a short crop or anything happens to their means of living, if the game is scarce, or there is a hard winter, I would deal out rations to them and feed them; but I would make no previous contracts. The whole system at present, it seems to me, is complicated and a drain upon the Treasury; and if this amendment contemplates an unlimited continuance of it I am opposed to it, and if it is to be pressed to-night I have considerable to say on the subject.

Mr. HARLAN. With the Senator's leave, I will venture to suggest to the honorable chairman that perhaps it would be better not to press this amendment on this bill. It may be that a large majority of the Senate would approve it, but I should prefer to examine it as a separate measure. The treaties with the Cherokees I remember, and I think with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, negotiated in 1866, provide for the settlement of other Indians in their Territory.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. But they were very careful to stipulate that they should be civilized and friendly Indians.

Mr. HENDERSON. All that settled east of a certain line of longitude; but all that settled west of that line were not required to be civilized.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator is probably right in that. I would make one other suggestion. This amendment provides that the agents shall notify the Indians of the various tribes west and south of the desire of the Government that they should move. The moment you begin to talk to an Indian tribe about moving it unsettles their minds and they quit work, as the Senator from Kansas can bear witness that all the tribes in Kansas with whom we have been negotiating treaties have quit work and are idle and destitute on account of not having put in any crops this year; and I think that result would follow such a notification to all the tribes referred to in this amendment. I am rather inclined to think it would be better to gather them into this Territory in detail, to make the arrangement with the several tribes tribe by tribe.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is just what this amendment does.

Mr. HARLAN. It may be that I would approve every portion of the proposed amendment, but, personally, I should prefer to examine it as a separate measure rather than to have it passed hastily as an amendment in an appropriation bill. I only make the suggestion. It may be that other Senators are willing to act upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not intend at this hour of the night to waste the time of the Senate, because I doubt whether we have a quorum present. I regret very much that any opposition should be manifested in the Senate to this amendment. It is the recommendation of the peace commissioners of last fall; it is precisely the recommendation contained in their report. We devoted a great deal of time to this subject, and came to the conclusion that for the good of the Government and for the good of the Indians we must go to work and concentrate them; and it is in accordance with the legislation of last July, twelve months ago.

Mr. CONNESS. Has it been printed?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir. The law organizing the Indian peace commission provided—upon the suggestion, I believe, of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE]—that we should set aside a Territory or Territories or a district or districts of country upon which the Indian tribes might be concentrated. This amendment does not propose an appropriation; there is not a dollar of appropriation in it; but it sets aside a district of country, containing the country now occupied by the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and it contemplates that upon this territory in process of time we shall gather all the plains Indians. The treaties at Medicine Lodge last fall carried out that idea. We have placed upon this country the Chickasaws, Arapahoes, Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches. The Wichitas are already upon it.

Our purpose is, if the legislation of the country will permit us or require us to do it, to collect together all the Indians in that section of the country, and then to abandon the idea of treaties. That is just what the Indian peace commission have been contemplating. We want to get rid of the existing treaties and never make any more. In other words, we want to organize a Territory. All that is done in this amendment is to require the Secretary of the Interior to adopt such rules and regulations between this time and the meeting of Congress next fall as he believes sufficient and proper for the government of the Indians in this particular district who shall be collected there, and that he shall submit those rules and regulations to Congress. If Congress will take action upon them, as I hope, and organize a Territory and establish a government there, we can go to work and appoint a Governor and council, and have such legislation in this Indian territory as will in fact keep it out of Congress. We want to abolish entirely all this treaty-making power; we want to do away with it, to get rid of it in the future, and make such appropriations for this Indian territory from year to year as may be right, just as we formerly did for Nevada when it was a Territory; just as we do now for Dakota, Idaho, and Montana.

Now, sir, when we can arrive at that end we shall get rid of these Indian appropriation bills from year to year, and we shall never do it until then. My idea is to establish a Territory there; and I have an amendment in my hand establishing one north of Nebraska for the Sioux and all that body of Indians lying in Montana and on the Missouri river east of the Rocky mountains. If I had my way I would establish two or three reservations west of the Rocky mountains, one, perhaps, in Oregon; get some good agricultural country there; one in Washington Territory, one in California, and assemble upon these particular districts of country all the Indians in the immediate vicinity, and not have more than four or five Indian reservations in the entire territory of the United States. When we shall do that, $2,000,000 dollars will cover all the Indian expenses. Five hundred thousand dollars for each of those reservations will be amply sufficient, and we shall avoid from year to year the appropriation of from four to five million dollars.

I know that Senators shrink at these appropriations; but if I know myself I have attempted to reduce them as much as I possibly could. I feel the importance of economy as much as any Senator. I am economical in my own affairs; and in legislation I think I am equally so; but I do not chaffer or shrink from an appropriation when I believe that in the end it will save much larger expenditures by the Government; and hence it is that I have not hesitated in this bill to march right up to appropriations that are absolutely necessary.

Sir, this amendment is the very thing that the Senator from Nevada wants. It will, in the course of a year or two, do away with all these treaties, and we can abolish them entirely. All that we now need is the consent of the Indians in the vicinity to remove upon this territory. Our object was to get the Navajoes to come upon it, but they refused. They insisted upon going to their old country, and rather than have difficulty or war with them, or attempt to bring them upon the Cherokee country and have them run off, we permitted them to go back to their old country. But in the process of time we contemplate that it is possible to get the entire body of plains Indians, New Mexico Indians, and others, upon this southern reservation; and to collect the Assinaboines, Arickarees, Mandans, Gros Ventres, and all the Missouri river Indians and Montana Indians upon the north reservation. When that is done, they are in a body, and you can educate them; they are in a body, and you can teach them farming; they are in a body, and you can teach them the English language, and do away with their barbarous habits. If, however, the Senate believe in the present policy of keeping them on small reservations scattered all over the country, a tribe here and a tribe there, having a superintendent for four or five tribes, and an agent for each tribe, instead of this policy of congregating them together and having a Governor and Legislative Council for the government of the entire body upon the Territory, of course I shall withdraw the amendment; but I believe it is the most important amendment offered to-night.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will withdraw this amendment. He has said enough to show us that we cannot discuss it; time will not permit. It is a great scheme. There may be a great deal in it. At first blush it looks to me a good deal utopian; but I am willing to take the wisdom of the peace commissioner and make the most of it. But these amendments propose great schemes. They have not been printed, and we have not considered them sufficiently. I think it will be seen that it will be impossible for us to adopt them as amendments now, at the end of a long day, to an appropriation bill. I hope they will be put in the form of a separate bill, to be well and duly considered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state to the Senator that I offered a bill in January last containing these provisions, and which has been on the desks of members ever since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. If there is to be a vote on the amendment I am not through with my remarks upon it. I will inquire of the Senator from Missouri if he withdraws his amendment or insists upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I surely, against the wishes of the Senate at this hour of the night, will not press the amendment. If the Senator from Nevada insists upon making a long speech upon it, with the purpose of defeating the amendment, and says he is determined to do it, of course I must withdraw the amendment. But if Senators wish to come to a vote upon it it is easily understood; it is contained in a printed bill lying on the desks of members since January last, and the whole scheme was contained in the report of the Indian peace commission.

Mr. CONNESS. But it has never been discussed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I know it has not, because I have been engaged in other work.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator for information, whether he contemplates finishing this bill to-night?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. Otherwise I would suggest that his amendment be printed, and probably we will be able to act on it more intelligently to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest that the amendment be passed by for the present until we see whether we can finish the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will let it pass over.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I do not wish to occupy time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have one or two more amendments to offer. I move to insert as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Committees on Indian Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall examine the claim of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians for all matters of difference between them and the Government of the United States, and shall report the result of said examination to their respective Houses at the next session of Congress.

That was a requirement in the bill of the last session, but it became impossible for me to examine it, because I was employed in other duties.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Nobody objects to it.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know if this is not a claim for $1,800,000?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear the amendment again.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It merely directs the committees to examine into it and report to Congress.

Mr. STEWART. Have they not had time to examine it?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir. It was made my duty to do so last year, but after that I was sent out on other duty as one of the peace commission, and was occupied until the meeting of Congress. I could not do it. The attorneys for the Choctaws and Chickasaws are continually after Congress; and in fact, they have passed a bill through the lower House on the subject, and the bill is pending here in the Senate. Perhaps it will be called up to-morrow. Some member may call it up. It is insisted upon; but the Senate, I apprehend, is not prepared to pass upon a claim of such importance. The claim is for $1,800,000. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] perhaps will remember the claim, for it has been pressed upon the Department, and it has been pressed upon Congress ever since I have been here. By this amendment I make it the duty of the Indian Committees of the two Houses of Congress to examine and make a full and thorough report to both Houses at the next session, so that we can act upon it, if we act upon it at all, with judgment. There is nothing wrong in it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer another amendment, to add as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That section five of the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1868," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe that concludes the amendments from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with the exception of the amendments about these new reservations.

Mr. COLE. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line fifteen hundred and eighty-three, on page 63:

For removing Indians from South river reservation to Hoopa Valley and Round Valley reservations, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLE. I have another amendment to offer, to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Mendocino Indian reservation in California be restored to the public lands of the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the same to be surveyed and offered for sale in legal subdivisions not less than $\frac{1}{2}$ 25 per acre, and in such manner and in such quantities as to protect persons in possession and owning improvements thereon, having reference to the character and value of such improvements, to be determined by the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That any improvements of the United States on said reservation shall be appraised by the register and receiver of the land office of the district, and be paid for by the purchaser of the land on which they are located.

Mr. HARLAN. I should like to inquire what reservation this is?

Mr. COLE. It is the reservation in Mendocino county that has been abandoned for some years—two or three years at least. It extends up and down the country and back from the sea-shore about three miles, and contains altogether, according to the terms of the reservation, twenty-five thousand acres. It is not used as a reservation, and it ought to be restored to the public lands for the benefit of quite a number of persons in possession of different portions of it. They are very much annoyed and distressed that they are not able to obtain patents to their property that they have in possession. The value of the improvements that the United States have put there for Indian purposes is not great. There are some dilapidated houses, sheds, and so on, of little value.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, I have an impression that this reservation was provided to be disposed of by some former law; that the land itself was to be appraised.

Mr. COLE. No, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. If my colleague will let me answer that, the Senator from Iowa refers to the Nomee Lacke reservation, which was provided to be disposed of specially, and the land of which was valuable; but this is comparatively worthless land.

Mr. HARLAN. This is a different reservation?

Mr. COLE. Yes, sir. My colleague and myself agree as to the propriety of the amendment, and I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator if the Indians have been removed from the reservation?

Mr. COLE. There are no Indians there. They have been removed to Round Valley, across a range of mountains or two.

Mr. CONNESS. The amendment is recommended by the Commissioner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment on page 30, line seven hundred and twenty-four. I see that the Miamies in Kansas have an appropriation from year to year for a blacksmith and an assistant blacksmith, according to the provisions of a treaty, and yet they are living in a settlement of white inhabitants. There is no blacksmith furnished them, and yet the treaty provides for it, and you appropriate the money. Since this bill has been under consideration there has been sent in to me a letter on the subject, and I wish to move an amendment, if it meets the concurrence of the Senator from Missouri, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, on application of the Miami council be, and he is hereby authorized to pay out to said Miamies per capita the above appropriation.

You appropriate $840 for a blacksmith and assistant, but they do not have any blacksmith. They are farmers, and they get their blacksmithing done in the neighborhood; and this amendment is to allow the Secretary of the Interior to pay them this sum that you appropriate per capita instead of furnishing a blacksmith. If that is right, I want it put in. It has been sent to me. It is a matter that I am not very well acquainted with. You appropriate the money, but do not spend it, and this is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to divide it among the Indians who now get their blacksmithing done in the neighborhood. Is it right?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to it if the statement made by the Senator be vouched for by himself; but it seems to be mere information coming from others. If the Senator knows the fact that there are white blacksmiths in the neighborhood, and the Indians living among the whites get their work done there, I suppose there is no objection to it.

Mr. POMEROY. I think I am right. The acting commissioner will inform me if I am not.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to it.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I move to insert at the end of line seven hundred and twenty-four, the provision relating to the Miamies, the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, on the application of the Miami council be, and he is hereby authorized to pay out to said Miamies per capita any of the above funds heretofore appropriated and not used for the purposes for which appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend the bill by inserting on page 23, after line four hundred and forty-six the following proviso:

Provided, That no moneys hereby appropriated to the Creek tribe of Indians shall be to them paid until such Creeks as were enrolled by the Creek agent previous to the 14th day of March, A. D. 1867, and who were refused any share in the moneys then distributed per capita under orders from Louis V. Bogy, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for the reason that said persons were of African descent, shall first be paid therefrom a per capita dividend equal to that to which they were entitled in said payment of March 14, 1867, and equal to that paid to other Creek citizens at that time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to have some explanation of the amendment. I do not know that I understand it exactly.

Mr. THAYER. By the orders of Mr. Bogy, the per capita portion of the amounts due the Creeks was withheld from those of African descent. This amendment places them on the same footing as the others.

Mr. CONNESS. On what ground withheld?

Mr. THAYER. On the ground that they were of African descent.

Mr. CONNESS. What had that to do with it?

Mr. HARLAN. This provision, if the Senator will allow me, is perfectly right. It is provided in the treaty distinctly that there shall be no distinction made between full-blood Creeks and those of African blood. The delegates who negotiated the treaty insisted on it themselves, and declared they would not sign any treaty that had not some such provision in it. In paying the first installment under the treaty, it is said—I have not looked into that personally, but it is said—the Commissioner of Indian Affairs refused to permit any part of the payment to be made to those who were of African descent. The treaty provides that they shall be put on a perfect footing with the other Creeks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether it appears of record that that was the reason payment was not made?

Mr. THAYER. The Senator from Iowa can answer.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it a matter of record that the refusal to pay was on that ground?

Mr. HARLAN. I was so informed by the attorney for the Creek Indians. He stated to me that they had not been paid.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not the question. The recital made in a law ought to be based on something substantial, not upon mere rumor. It is recited here as a matter of fact that that was the ground. I want to know if that was the ground assigned in any report made by him, or in any official document?

Mr. HARLAN. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. POMEROY. I have a communication from the agent to the Department on the subject, and a copy of a letter which states that fact. This letter is written by Mr. Dunn, who was then the agent, and addressed to the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let it be read. The objection to this amendment is this, and I will call the Senator's attention to it—

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is the first time I ever heard of an Indian of African descent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was just going to remark that an Indian of African descent is a somewhat singular individual.

Mr. POMEROY. But they were adopted in the tribe.

Mr. HENDERSON. How adopted?

Mr. POMEROY. They married into the tribe.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose the Indian agent had enrolled white men and white women instead of Africans, and the Creeks had objected to dividing their annuities with white citizens because they were of Caucasian descent, and not African descent, then of course we should not allow it. Perhaps this agent, Mr. Dunn, may have put in a large number of negroes there and also whites who never sprang from the Creeks at all. I do not know how that is. But the amendment certainly goes too far. It requires that we shall now make appropriations to all these people of African descent enrolled by the agent of the Indians. I do not know who was enrolled and who was not enrolled. If the agent has enrolled people who are not entitled to the annuities of the Creeks, they ought not to have them. I would not make any objection if it included simply those entitled, but the Senator will see that the wording of this amendment is much too broad.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, that difficulty might be obviated by saying "properly enrolled under the provisions," &c.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. POMEROY. I send to the desk a letter on that subject. If the Clerk will read it it will explain it.

The CHIEF CLERK. This letter is dated Washington, June 1, 1868—

Mr. RAMSEY. I understand there is no objection to the amendment; and so there is no occasion to read the letter.

Mr. POMEROY. If there is no objection to the amendment I do not ask to have the letter read.

Mr. HARLAN. Let the amendment be modified so as to read "properly enrolled under the provisions of said treaty."

Mr. POMEROY. Of course they do not want to pay anybody that is not properly enrolled.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggested that it be modified to read "until such Creeks as may have been properly enrolled by the Creek agent." That would still leave the question to be determined by the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no moneys heretofore appropriated to the Creek tribe of Indians shall be to them paid until such Creeks as may have been properly enrolled by the Creek agent, &c.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That ought to be written "paid to them" instead of "to them paid." That is rather ancient style.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken on the amendment in relation to the case of Heald and Wright. I am afraid the Senate are doing great injustice to those parties. I have since seen the chairman of the Indian Committee of the House, who has had the matter in charge, and he informed me that I was correct in the statement I made to the Senate, that that committee had thoroughly investigated it and have not reported upon it simply because they have not been called. I think the Senate will hesitate to do this great injustice to these men in that state of the case. I move a reconsideration of the vote on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can offer the amendment again when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri if he cannot afford to dispense with the appropriation of $2,000 for transportation on the twenty-third page, line five hundred and forty-six. Looking over the appropriations to the Creek Indians I do not find anything to be paid in goods; it is all to be paid in money or to be paid to employes; and yet there is $2,000 appropriated for transportation.

Mr. POMEROY. Agricultural implements are to be purchased, and you have got to transport them.

Mr. HOWE. What agricultural implements?

Mr. POMEROY. In line five hundred and twenty-four there is an appropriation "for assistance in agricultural operations, during the pleasure of the President."

Mr. HOWE. Those are not implements.

Mr. POMEROY. You must have implements to carry on agriculture.

Mr. HENDERSON. To satisfy the Senator from Wisconsin that I am not mistaken about the necessity of the amendment, if he will look at the appropriation from line five hundred and thirty-seven to five hundred and forty-three, inclusive, he will find that we have a fund of $775,000 to the credit of the Creeks, and five per cent. per annum is paid upon that every year, making $38,750 40; and that is to be invested under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in such goods as he sees fit to send out for them.

Mr. HOWE. Is that to be invested in goods?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; it is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and it is expended in that way, as I understand. This discretionary power is given to the Secretary, as I understand it, to be invested in any way he chooses. If he does not so invest it, I apprehend, of course, this other expenditure will not be made.

Mr. HOWE. You think you cannot afford to dispense with it?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; I will not move an amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill on the third page by striking out lines fifty and fifty-one, as follows:

For pay of clerk to superintendent at St. Louis, Missouri, $1,200.

As the Senator will remember, there is no superintendency located at St. Louis.

Mr. HENDERSON. The superintendency at Omaha now is the St. Louis superintendency. It was first removed to Kansas City and then to Leavenworth, and from Leavenworth it has now been removed to Omaha.

Mr. HARLAN. That one was removed to Kansas. The St. Joseph superintendency was removed to Kansas, and the Minnesota superintendency to Nebraska.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe the Senator is correct. It is the St. Paul superintendency that was removed to Omaha, and the St. Louis superintendency is now what is called the Central superintendency. I was under an error.

Mr. HARLAN. If this appropriation is needed, it would better to correct the phraseology and say: "For pay of clerk for the Central superintendency."

Mr. HENDERSON. No; the Northern.

Mr. POMEROY. Omaha is the Northern.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the one we are speaking of. It is the one we intend to give the appropriation to, I believe. What line is it?

Mr. HARLAN. Page 3, lines fifty and fifty-one. "Central superintendency" is the name of that superintendency.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that it is intended for the Central superintendency, that it follows the St. Louis superintendency, which is now at Atchison, I believe. It went first to Kansas City, and from there to Leavenworth, and from Leavenworth to Atchison, and is now located at Atchison.

Mr. HARLAN. I move an amendment, to change the phraseology, to say "pay of clerk for the Central superintendency."

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection. I think that ought to be so; but the Commissioner told me this was the usual form.

Mr. POMEROY. I am informed by the superintendent that this is for the Central superintendency. Twelve hundred dollars, I suggest, is a small salary.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I call attention whether that is the usual amount for the clerk, $1,200 salary.

Mr. HENDERSON. The same amount is always paid.

Mr. POMEROY. You cannot get a good clerk for that, I think.

Mr. HENDERSON. We cannot get more appropriated.

Mr. THAYER. I offer the following amendment to come in on page 38, after line nine hundred and twelve:

For surveying into lots the reservation of the Ottos and Missourias established by the treaty 15th March, 1854, and the supplemental treaty of 9th December, 1854, as provided in sixth article treaty of 15th March, 1854, $7,148.

Mr. HOWE. Does that come from a committee?

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir; from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is recommended by the Department. I hold in my hand the estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose again the amendment for the Heald and Wright case. It is to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the awards made to Joseph G. Heald and Reuben Wright, under the fifth article treaty of April 23, 1836, with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, the sum of $90,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the sum of $300,000, now to the credit of the Choctaw nation in the Treasury of the United States, placed there in conformity with the tenth and thirteenth articles, treaty of June 22, 1835, with the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

I am informed that this is a just claim against the Choctaws, and they are anxious that it should be paid.

Mr. POMEROY. It is a private claim.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McDONALD] says he knows all about it, and says that it is a just and proper claim, and a member of the House of Representatives informs me that this question has been before them for four months and thoroughly investigated, and it is a just claim, and would have been reported there but that the Indian Committee has not been called for reports.

Mr. HARLAN. That it may not be rejected without a full understanding, I will state that when the treaty of 1861 was under consideration the delegates of the Choctaws and Chickasaws considered this matter thoroughly, took ample time to do it, and were assisted by an attorney of the name of Latrobe, from Baltimore, I suppose known to many of the lawyers here as a very able man; and they made up their minds that it was just and honorable that they should provide for this claim to the amount of $90,000. That was the minimum fixed. They agreed that they would pay that amount to gentlemen who had goods in their country when the war begun, and which they seized and appropriated to their own use after the beginning of the rebellion. The gentlemen were down there with heavy stocks of goods as traders, and their goods were taken by these Indians. They agreed, after considering it fully and thoroughly, to pay the claim. I think there was no dissenting votes among the delegates of these tribes as to the justice and propriety of their obligation in honor to meet it. They stipulated, however, that the aggregate amount should not exceed $90,000, and that if the claim should amount to more than that sum it should be paid pro rata. I understand that the amount proved up and admitted to be just is much larger than that amount; but under the treaty they have not obligated themselves to pay more than $90,000. There is no catch in it. It is a fair agreement.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say, as I spoke when this question was up before upon it, that since that time Governor BOWWELL, of the other House, whose character cannot be questioned, came and informed me that the House committee had this under consideration and accepted the claim as a correct one, having investigated it fully, but that the committee could not report again at this session, and they were exceedingly desirous that it should be adopted as an amendment to this bill. He said that he had thoroughly examined it and had no doubt on the subject.

Mr. HARLAN. I ought to state further that these tribes were informed that the Government would not insist on their providing for this claim unless they themselves thought it was just and right; and with that statement made distinctly to them, and after considering it for several days, they came to the conclusion that they were in honor bound to provide for it to that extent.

Mr. POMEROY. Do I understand the Senator to say it is in the treaty?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir; they agreed in the treaty to pay this claim to the amount of $90,000 out of their own funds.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I make no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Indians admit the obligation to pay; but they say that they did not understand the money was to come out of their annuities in the Treasury, which they were receiving, but they thought it ought to come out of the claim they have.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill to provide for the protection of American citizens abroad.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know that anybody has any objection to that bill coming up; but there is not a quorum here, and not half a quorum. I think it is fair that we should adjourn with the coast clear, and let us vote with a full Senate in the morning. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays. It was very well understood to-day that one bill should succeed the other.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not so understand. Mr. CONNESS. Very well; we will try it by a vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken. The call of the roll having been concluded,

Mr. HENDRICKS, (who had voted in the negative.) I will change my vote; there is no possibility of getting a quorum, and I vote yea. It is evident we cannot transact business.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I will change my vote; I vote yea.

Mr. CONKLING. I take it there will be no difficulty in getting the bill up to-morrow. I do not see why we should stay here at eleven o'clock to-night in order to try and get a quorum.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will withdraw my vote to the affirmative.

Mr. CONNESS. I change my vote.

Mr. THAYER. I change my vote from the negative to the affirmative.

Mr. McDONALD. I change my vote to yea.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McDonald, Osborn, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Thayer, and Van Winkle—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Corbett, Harlan, Stewart, Wade, and Wilson—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Welch, Whyte, Willey, Williams, and Yates—36.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 16, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CAPTURED COTTON.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, relative to certain cotton taken possession of by Colonel Jackson at or near Vicksburg, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

GOVERNMENT VESSELS BOUGHT, SOLD, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with resolution of the House of January 27, 1868, reports of the Quartermaster General relative to the number of vessels bought, sold and chartered by the United States since April, 1861; which was referred to the joint select Committee on Retrenchment.

HOMESTEADS TO ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a correction of the Journal. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] reported yesterday, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill (H. R. No. 1433) to amend an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1802; which was recommitted. By the Journal it appears that a motion of the gentleman from Indiana to reconsider the reference was "passed over for the present." The fact was that I made the motion to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table, which was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] was made some time afterward, and had reference to other bills. The motion to reconsider the reference of the bill (H. R. No. 1433) was made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and was entered on the Journal for future consideration.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Speaker will recollect that I made the motion to cover all those cases.

The SPEAKER. But the motion to reconsider the reference of this particular bill had already been entered and passed over for the present, and could not be reached by the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HOPKINS] confirms my recollection. He understood that the motion to reconsider was laid on the table. If he had not so understood he would have made the motion himself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin may confirm the recollection of the gentleman from Illinois, but that does not alter the parliamentary condition of the question. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] made the motion to reconsider while other business was pending, and, as the Journal correctly states, the "motion was passed over for the present." In regard to the other bills, the gentleman from Illinois moved to reconsider the votes on reference and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. That could be done, no separate vote being demanded on each bill. But that did not affect the motion to reconsider which had already been entered on the Journal to be called up at a future time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I call up now that motion to reconsider, and move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, under the rule, cannot do that. The rule provides that a motion to reconsider "shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day without the consent of the House, and thereafter" (that is, after the succeeding day,) "any member may call it up for consideration." After to-day the motion to reconsider can be called up by any member.

WILLIAM M. SIMPSON.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1434) granting a pension to William M. Simpson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIG HIGHLAND MARY.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 113) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the British-built brig Highland Mary.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the British bark Highland Mary, owned by H. & S. French, of Sag Harbor, New York.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM SPENCE, OF TENNESSEE.

On motion of Mr. STOKES, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Spence, of Tennessee, for reference to one of the Departments.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order.

ELECTION CONTEST—SWITZLER VS. ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections upon the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson, from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Anderson is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Resolved, That William F. Switzler is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. BENJAMIN resumed and concluded the remarks which he commenced yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: The report of the Committee of Elections in this case, I regret to say, has very much surprised the delegation from the State of Missouri. It is also true the loyal people of that State were entirely unprepared for such a result. If I am not very greatly mistaken many of the members of this House from other States—members who had made themselves conversant with the facts in the case—listened to the reading of the resolutions of the committee with perfect astonishment.

With all respect to the members of the Committee of Elections, I must be permitted to say that in my judgment they have entirely ignored and set at naught the spirit, if not the very letter, of the constitution and laws of the State of Missouri relating to elections and the qualifications of voters, and which were designed to protect the purity of the ballot-box in the hands of loyal men. I will not believe a majority of this House will ratify their recommendation until they so declare by their votes. More especially am I disinclined to believe the House will adopt the resolutions of the committee, knowing, as I do know, that its effect will be either to place the affairs of the State in the hands of the very men upon whose skirts is the blood of thousands who perished therein upholding your Constitution and defending your flag, or again compel the loyal and law-abiding people to "take care that the laws are faithfully executed" at the risk of war and bloodshed. Establish the doctrine that all who will swear may vote, and the consequences are plainly foreseen.

This case, Mr. Speaker, involves much more than the right of any one particular individual to a seat in this House. It matters but little to the State of Missouri or the country at large whether the contestant or the sitting member represents the people of the ninth district. The legislation of Congress can in no respect be changed by unseating Mr. ANDERSON, nor will the large Radical majority in this House be sensibly affected thereby. If this were an ordinary contest, and the effect of the decision merely to confirm a particular individual in his right to a seat here, it would be comparatively insignificant, and beyond the parties to the record of but small moment. But this is not its only effect. There is a great principle in issue, and the decision upon it will be felt in Missouri from its center to its circumference. I ask the indulgence of the House while I examine this contest from the standpoint occupied by those upon whom your Government relied in the day of its trial to preserve the State to your Union.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that a history of Missouri politics, with a narrative of the various struggles through which we have passed, would be uninteresting to many, and perhaps unprofitable. Gentlemen whose homes have never been invaded by the spoiler, and whose ears have never been stunned with the demon yell of midnight assassins, are slow in comprehending the situation in Missouri. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLANT,] the author of this report, has never been aroused from his peaceful slumbers and compelled to flee for life by the light of his burning dwelling. His heart has never been pierced by the death-scries of those most dear to him, and himself powerless to succor or protect. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVES,] chairman of the committee, has "heard a lion in the lobby roar," but he seems never to have heard of that pestilence that walked in darkness, spreading contagion far and near, murder its employment, ruin its sport. Missouri has seen it, heard it, and realized it. Tennessee has passed through this "furnace of affliction." Let her Representatives on this floor tell of the authors of her ruin and the patience and long-suffering of their loyal constituents. Listen to the experiences of the Union members who are now "coming up out of great tribulation" from States further South. They will tell you of the days when loyalty was hunted like the stag—when "Their matrons for shelter had fled

To the mountains and deserts afar,
For their hamlets in ruins were laid,
And their tender ones victims of war."

They can tell you of the days when a despotism as terrible and oppressive as Moslem barbarism ever saw reigned throughout the South. They can tell you of the time when the cherished emblem of your country's nationality was lowered at the demand of armed traitors, and darkness had spread its mantle like a pall over half your territory. They can tell you of the scenes through which they passed, when loyalty was crushed beneath the heel of slavery's tyranny;

"When the hearts of the mighty were bowed,
When the lowly were laggard with care,
When the voices of hunger were loud
As they shrieked the wild notes of despair."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, when they tell you of all this, the half thereof has not been told. Gentlemen from New England, New York, and Pennsylvania cannot imagine nor realize the emotions that take possession of those who have thus endured for loyalty's sake, at the bare thought of being again subjected to the grinding despotism of those from whom they have been emancipated at such fearful cost. That such will be the result of a sanction of the majority report by the House is sadly apparent to the loyal people of the State of Missouri.

I have said this report and the doctrine it seeks to establish are in conflict with the constitution and laws of the State. I will endeavor to make it so appear to the House, firmly believing that, aided by the light afforded by the testimony in the case and such attendant circumstances as form a part of the history of the country and are notorious everywhere, I can do so successfully.

From the day Fort Sumter fell until the day of the election in 1866 a majority of the population of the State of Missouri had either been engaged in rebellion against the Government of the United States or were aiders and comforters of those so engaged. In 1861 the Governor and other State officers, nearly every member in both Houses of the Legislature, and at least three fourths of all the county and municipal officers were either open and avowed enemies or sympathizers with treason. Of but little avail were the efforts of Union men in protecting themselves and in trying to uphold your Government so long as the laws were dictated by traitors and executed by their confederates. Hence the first step in suppressing the rebellion in that State was to depose and overthrow the traitorous State government. As one man the loyal people put themselves to the work, and with the aid of their friends from the adjoining States the task was successfully accomplished. The provisional government instituted in its stead administered the affairs of the State until at the general election in November, 1864, the direct question was submitted to the people, "Will you have a convention to amend your constitution by abolishing slavery and protecting the ballot-box in the hands of loyal men and loyal men only?" The response was "Yes," by a majority of more than thirty thousand. Delegates were elected, among whom was the contestant, he being the candidate of the disloyalists of the district in which he resides, every one of whom voted "No" on the question of calling a convention.

The convention met in January, 1865, and was by no means sluggish in doing the people's will. The third day of its session was made memorable by the passage of an ordinance which sundered the shackles that enslaved one hundred and twenty thousand human beings. This, the first practical step in the great emancipation march, received the votes of every member in the convention save the contestant and some three others. The other duty with which the convention was charged, the disfranchisement of rebels, was performed after due deliberation, and referred back to the people for their adoption or rejection in the shape of an amended constitution, and ratified in May following, after one of the most exciting political contests through which we had ever passed. That constitution is to-day the fundamental law of the State, and under it and by virtue of the laws passed in pursuance of it the election was held which gives rise to this contest.

To the convention of which I have spoken the people elected a large majority of Radicals. Indeed, I believe there were but four exceptions—the contestant and three others—one of whom, the contestant's colleague, elected by the same votes, and a resident of the county of Callaway, a county of which I shall have more to say in the course of my argument, was expelled for his disloyalty.

Is it at all strange or remarkable, Mr. Speaker, that the provisions of a constitution framed by a convention thus politically constituted, and backed by a radically-loyal constituency, many of whom were even then marching with Sherman to the sea, should be radical in their character? Would it not have been surprising had they been otherwise? The delegates were specially charged to frame such an instrument as should perpetuate the power they had sacrificed so much to attain in loyal hands. Who can, for one moment, suppose that such a people would willingly permit those whom they had vanquished in the fight to return and become the victors at the polls?

The third section of the second article in the constitution says who shall not vote nor hold office in the State. The section is long, for we have rebels there in very great variety. I will not detain the House by reading it, for I can explain it in less time. First, all those who have been in arms against the Government or given aid and comfort to the enemy, and all those who sympathized with such enemies, being what we call the "stay-at-home" or "do-nothing" rebels, are disfranchised. This includes the great bulk of those to whom suffrage is denied. Still there are others. In the dark days of 1862, when rebel marauders swarmed in every portion of the State, the authorities called upon every able-bodied man to buckle on armor and rally in defense of their homes and firesides. There was a large force of these stay-at-home rebels who were the spies and informers for the "knights of the bush," and really the most dangerous of our enemies.

It would never do to organize and arm such men. In every case where the experiment was tried the enemy was reinforced. Therefore the enrolling officers were directed to require the party enrolled to declare himself as either loyal or disloyal, for the Union or against it. If found loyal he was armed and sent to the field. If disloyal a small commutation in money was assessed, but which in nine cases out of every ten was never paid. This third section disfranchises all those who thus voluntarily declared for the enemy. There was another class whom I will mention. They were not peculiar to Missouri. Every State had more or less of them; but they were not equally dangerous everywhere. I refer to the skeddaddlers from enrollment and draft. Missouri says to such:

"You who from fight have run away
Shant come and fight another way."

Therefore the ballot-box is closed against them.

These are the persons, Mr. Speaker, who are not permitted to take part in the affairs of government in the State of Missouri. As all know, a terrible storm was raised and still continues to rage with unabated fury. Rebels, their sympathizers and others who have made themselves the champions of their cause and expect to profit by their votes some day, have assailed this constitution with a demon-like vindictiveness, and employed every artifice the ingenuity of man can invent to evade and set at naught its provisions.

It is not my present purpose, nor is it necessary, that I should enter upon its defense in arguing this case. The character of its provisions relating to suffrage was passed upon by this House in another contested case from Missouri—the case of Birch vs. Van Horn—and unanimously sustained. It is not drawn in question by any issue presented in this case. I will only remind gentlemen of the fact that it was framed amid the din of battle and the clash of arms in a civil strife such as the world had never before witnessed. It was thought indispensable to the security of those "who had borne the burden in the heat of the day." Indeed, we were then engaged in a hand-to-hand conflict with an enemy whose barbarities find no parallel in the history of civilized warfare. Who would not under such circumstances employ such weapons as were at his command in his defense? To such, if any there be, who are of opinion that a spirit of persecution and vindictiveness is manifest in our dealings with traitors, let me address a single word. Your laws are regarded as humane, certainly as much so as those of other civilized nations. Had we spoken as your statute speaks we would have said, "You who have been guilty of treason shall be hung by the neck until you are dead, dead, dead." Had we spoken as your statute speaks we would have said, "You who have aided and abetted those engaged in rebellion shall be imprisoned and your property confiscated." These are the penalties your laws prescribe for the offenses of which these men were guilty. Instead of which we say, virtually, "We will restore to you the life, liberty, and property you have forfeited, and that an offended law demands; but you must not be permitted to occupy positions that will enable you to reenact the scenes through which we have passed." If we are again to take the viper to our bosoms we must be permitted to extract his fangs. And yet for merely providing in this gentle manner for our future safety we are denounced as barbarous and vindictive.

Having thus declared who shall not vote nor hold office, it was necessary that provision be made for enforcing it and making it effective. How are we to identify them in the future? How are the sheep to be separated from the goats? The mark which Cain wore they were enabled to conceal. Upon their honor no reliance whatever could be placed. While an oath in some cases might have a restraining influence, as a safeguard it was entirely valueless. Who could suppose that he who had so often violated it before, and gloried in so doing, could be expected to acknowledge its binding force now. Often and often copies of the oath of loyalty, taken to procure their enlargement from prison, had been found in the pockets of the dead, the wounded, and the captive on the field of battle. And what wonder when the presses and politicians of the Opposition were daily proclaiming to them the unconstitutionality of requiring it, and that true patriotism demanded its violation.

Knowing these facts, as the members of the convention well knew them, they provided in the constitution that the Legislature should enact a law for the registry of the qualified voters of the State. Although the oath of loyalty must be taken in all cases before registry, that is not conclusive. If the person is really disqualified, and that fact is known to the registering officer, or proven to him by the testimony of others, the applicant must be rejected.

Acting upon these requirements of the Constitution, the Legislature at its session in 1866 passed the law which governed in the case we are now considering. It provides for a supervisor of registration for each county, who shall appoint a registering officer for each of its precincts. These registering officers hold sessions in their respective precincts for the purpose of passing upon the qualifications of persons offering to register, and upon the completion of their lists, all meet at the court-house and form a court of appeals and revision presided over by the supervisor of registration. Any person rejected may appeal to the board, and any person may challenge the qualifications of any other person whose name appears on the list. The revision being completed, a copy of the approved list is furnished the judges of election of the proper precinct, who are to receive the ballot of no person whose name does not appear on the list as a qualified voter.

Upon the passage of the registry law, in which nothing unusual appears, and to which it would seem none could possibly take exception, the entire rebel horde affected great indignation, and raised a howl that might possibly have disturbed the nerves of men less familiar with the vapors of disarmed traitors and their allies. Always fertile in invention when obstacles interposed between them and an office, they set about devising schemes whereby they might evade the law. In several of the counties the old slave aristocracy still reigns supreme. In such, the Union element is barely sufficient to save them from being Sodomized. It was arranged that in these counties, such a system of intimidation, by threatenings of personal violence, lawsuits, and proscriptions of one kind and another, should be inaugurated as should effectually prevent the carrying out of the law, and the registering officers be forced to place on the list the name of every man who would take the oath. Another plan was to permit no registry whatever to be made, and should it be attempted to seize and destroy the books and compel the officers to desist or resign. The tarring and feathering process, a manly sport and much in vogue in the good old days of their pride and power, and for which they cherished a lively recollection, was openly talked of. That institution had fallen somewhat into disuse since so many of the young men of the country had taken to wearing blue. "A free vote or a free fight" was everywhere proclaimed from the stump and echoed by every rebel in the State.

Under the law the judges of election certify the poll-books to the clerk of the county court, who certifies the number of votes given for each candidate to the secretary of State, from whose office the commission issues. The secretary, as the law then was, had no means of knowing how things were conducted in the different counties, and being precluded from going behind the return, must declare the result from the return itself. Once in possession of the offices the victory was complete. Although to contest is a right, yet it is no remedy whatever in such cases. Somebody must decide in the event of a contest, and generally the decision rests with men who were themselves parties to the fraud and elected by the same fraudulent means. When it is otherwise there is no difficulty in protracting the litigation and postponing the decision beyond the official life of the incumbent.

But this was not all. The judiciary was invoked to assist in thwarting the will of the people and nullifying their laws. In several of the judicial circuits the taking of the required oath on the part of the judge involved a stretch of conscience to its utmost tension. All their sympathies and associations were with the rebels. Their future hopes and aspirations were wholly dependent on the favor in which they were held by traitors. The usual seductive appliances were brought into requisition, the elastic conscience yielded readily, and these "whited sepulchers" were fast becoming more dangerous to loyalty and liberty than their accomplices who fought with the sword.

The constitution provides for the pardon and forgiveness of such rebels as "bring forth fruits meet for repentance." Whoever voluntarily entered the Federal service and received an honorable discharge therefrom may be relieved from the disqualification that attaches for his complicity with the rebellion, by a decree of the circuit court. In order that the fact may be ascertained, he must file his petition, verified by affidavit, stating the facts relating to his enlistment and discharge, and after five days the judge may investigate the case, hear the proofs, and decree a removal of the disability in cases authorized by the constitution. Here was found the means by which "loyalty was made easy," and individual reconstruction, in view of the approaching election, was carried on in two or three circuits with railroad speed. No regard whatever was paid to the requirements of the constitution in the proceedings. Having been disarmed and assigned to duty in company Q was an entering into the military service, and a release from prison upon oath and parole a sufficient discharge from the United States service, in the judgment of these Dogberrys, to authorize a decree in his favor. Large numbers were thus manufactured, that they might vote the rebel ticket. The judge, in whose circuit is the county of Callaway was very active in this labor of love. The portals of his temple were kept open night and day, his crier hourly making proclamation "whosoever will let him come." Runners were sent into the highways and the byways, into the thickets and clefts of the rocks, to inform the "chivalry" of this "straight and narrow way." Great numbers eagerly pressed forward. In many cases the burrs and leaves were still clinging to their gory locks and butternut garments, as they passed in review before these oracles. Imagine their astonishment at hearing the glad tidings, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee; arise, take up thy ballot and vote." The troubled waters were no more potent in their healing properties, nor their effect more speedy, than were these judicial machines in washing away the sins of murder and treason.

The Legislature had not yet adjourned. The plans of the conspirators were developed a little too soon to be entirely successful. By a supplementary bill, passed to meet the cases I have enumerated, it is provided that the supervisors of registration shall certify copies of the registry lists, when completed, to the secretary of State, that the evidence of registry may be with him before finally canvassing the votes and declaring the result. It also provides that whenever registration is demanded by virtue of these judicial decrees, the officer shall require the applicant to produce his discharge, or failing to do so, reject him. But Callaway preferred to be a law unto herself, and the law of the State was entirely ignored. The supervisor of registration gives a list of persons registered in the town of Fulton who were thus relieved, not one of whom had ever been in the service a day. If gentlemen will look on page 88 of the testimony of the sitting member they will see the fact stated and certified to by the supervisor.

Notwithstanding this law the judges refused to stay their hands. With redoubled diligence they kept their machines running up to the last day on which the reconstructed prodigal could register. The Legislature not only endeavored to prevent these frauds, but it finally called the judges to account for this and other flagrant violations of the constitution and laws. One they caused to be removed by address. Another was impeached, convicted, removed, and forever disqualified. These prompt proceedings had a very salutary effect. It is hoped and believed these abuses are checked for the future. I entreat the House not to sanction their perpetration in the past.

Mr. Speaker, if I have succeeded in making myself understood, the House is prepared to enter understandingly upon this particular case, and which, I trust, members will consider in the light of these surroundings. As will be seen, this is not an ordinary case of contest. No precedent can be found involving the principles here in issue. Not only Missouri, but every other State having laws of a similar character, and upon the enforcement of which your own Constitution and laws are to be maintained, feels a deep interest in the precedent you are about to establish.

The ninth congressional district of Missouri is composed of ten counties, one of which is the county of Callaway. The whole case rests on the vote of that county. If counted, the contestant is elected, and if not counted, the sitting member retains his seat. The secretary of State rejected it, and gave the certificate to the sitting member. In this I am of opinion he is correct, both as to the law and the fact. A majority of the committee think otherwise, and have so reported. The reasons they give in the report are, in my judgment, untenable, unsound, and their conclusions warranted neither by the law nor the testimony.

In justification of the action of the secretary in rejecting the vote of Callaway county, the contestee pleads that such a system of intimidation and threatening was resorted to by the disloyal prior to the registration as to effectually prevent a fair registry of that county, and that the secretary had the most positive testimony on the subject before him when he cast up the votes.

Let me digress for one moment and describe Callaway county and notice the character of its inhabitants. It lies in the center of the State, borders on the Missouri river, and is fertile, populous, and wealthy. At the breaking out of the war the number of slaves held there was large, and the rule held good everywhere that the disloyalty of the inhabitants corresponded very nearly with the density of the slave population. Callaway was the most intensely disloyal and furnished more recruits to the rebel armies than any county in the State of Missouri. In the whole southern confederacy, outside of South Carolina, it was rare a community could be found in which the people were more unanimous in their hostility to the Union, or more zealous in the cause of treason. After the assault on Sumter, Unionism and Union men were placed under the ban, and the reign of terror that prevailed there was fearful. Most of them fled to other localities. The few that remained tacitly yielded, and were bent beneath the storm. Not an echo to the shouts of the loyal and the victories of loyalty over treason that went forth from other parts of the State, was heard from Callaway during the war, nor even to the present day. The committee say, in their report, (page 8,) "during the war this county was in a more peaceful condition than many other parts of the State." Do gentlemen of the committee not know that "where there is no wood the fire goeth out?" Does the committee not know that during the war there was less commotion and internal strife in South Carolina than any of the insurgent States? There was nothing in Callaway for rebellion to feed upon. This paragraph from the report of the committee is really one of the best reasons that can be given to impeach the registry of that county, which contains more than two thousand names as legal voters. There were none to resist the onward march of treason, and it held high carnival. One single achievement of the chivalry of the county illustrates the kind of peace which reigned there. The lunatic asylum and other charitable institutions, built and supported by the munificence of the State, are located at Fulton, the county seat. Upon the first sound of the rebel tocsin the people arose en masse, assaulted these humane institutions, plundered them of their bedding and everything else that could be made available in the rebel army, and turned their unfortunate inmates into the streets. The adjoining county of Boone, the home of the contestant, was the theater of the most barbarous massacre of the war, not even excepting Fort Pillow. One hundred and eighty as true patriots as ever lived were butchered, scalped, and their bodies mutilated in a manner that finds no parallel in the history of savage warfare. They rest to-day in one common grave, hastily prepared by a few kind friends for their reception. "No useless coffins inclose their breasts," nor mound nor monumental stone mark their place of sepulture.

"The winds that sweep the wintry sky
No more disturb their sweet repose,
Than summer evening's latent sigh
That shuts the rose."

Their blood to-day cries to us from the ground. Unquestionably the names of many of their murderers appear on this registry list, who not only claim but find no difficulty in proving they are and at all times have been loyal to your Government and its laws.

But the committee say we have no proof of all this. In the name of God, must the history of the country be proved to the committee? Must evidence be adduced to satisfy it that we have passed through a dreadful civil war, and that the soil of Missouri was daily drinking patriotic blood from the beginning to its close? Will it not take judicial notice of what everybody knows, and history records? Surely, Mr. Speaker, such a rule cannot prevail in the Congress of the United States.

The Secretary of State well knew the character of Callaway county. From his office in the capitol at Jefferson City his eye could extend across the Missouri river and rest upon Callaway soil. He knew, what everybody knew, that Callaway no more had two thousand legal voters than it had two millions. But he was not authorized to act upon his own knowledge, nor was it necessary. The Legislature had just passed an act to meet just such cases. Its first section says:

"The supervisors of registration for the several counties and for each senatorial district in the city and county of St. Louis are hereby required to make out and forward to the secretary of state immediately after the completion of the registration in their respective counties and districts a certified copy of the registration thereof, which shall contain the names of all registered voters; which certified copy shall be evidence of the facts therein stated, and may be used as such in any contested-election case or other legal proceedings."

The supervisor in Callaway did make out and certify the list, and what does it contain?

First, there appears upon it 2,034 names of persons registered as legal voters. Second, under the head of remarks the status of 730 of that number is described, which shows that not one of them is qualified to vote under the law, and finally the following certificates of the supervisor of registration and three of the registering officers are appended, and which I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing list of registration is a correct copy "as furnished me by the officers of registration" for the various election districts in and for Calloway county, Missouri. And I hereby further certify that the registration law in its letter and spirit was not carried out in any one of the election districts of said county; that such a system of intimidation and threatening was carried on by the disloyal and those opposed to the law as to deter loyal men from undertaking the registration in most of the election districts, and was consequently intrusted to men who most shamefully disregarded the law.

In the few districts where men could be had who were willing to register according to the law, there was such intimidation and threatening used as to deter those who were willing to make objections to those they knew not to be entitled to registration as qualified voters, and as a consequence the law could not and was not carried out, as the certificates hereto appended show.

Given under my hand this December 12, 1866.

WILLIAM H. THOMAS,
Supervisor of Registration for Calloway county, Missouri.

I hereby certify that I was appointed officer of registration for Round Prairie township, Calloway county, Missouri, by Thomas Ansell; that in entering upon the duties of the office I found much stubbornness manifested. The people who made application for registration as qualified voters refused to be examined as to qualifications; and from the danger that would arise from an attempt on my part to issue compulsory process for witnesses, every one of whom were afraid to volunteer objections to persons registering, &c., I would be entirely unable to carry out the law in my district, and therefore resigned my office. I am clearly of the opinion that not one-fourth of the number registered as qualified voters in the county are legal voters according to law.

H. S. TURNER.
FULTON, MISSOURI, December 1, 1866.

I hereby certify that I was appointed by Thomas Ansell as officer of registration for Bourbon township, Calloway county, Missouri; that I entered upon my duties in compliance with the law, and that men who had been reported as the worst rebels in my district made application for registration and took the prescribed oath; that in no case was any objection made, and personally not knowing any acts of disloyalty that would debar them from registration as qualified voters, I felt bound under the law to register them as such. I am certain that the few loyal men of my district were afraid to make objections to persons who they knew were not entitled to registration as qualified voters, and I fully believe it would have been dangerous for them to have done so. I firmly believe that a great majority of those registered by me as qualified voters have been and are disloyal. I judge this from the little respect they had for Federal soldiers—the little interest they took in giving information to the Union officers during the war, and their contempt generally for the Union men of the county.

JAMES E. TURLEY,
Officer of Registration.

I hereby certify that I was appointed by Thomas Ansell as register of Cedar township, in Calloway county, Missouri; that I entered upon the discharge of my duties according to law, and rejected all persons whom I knew from my own personal knowledge to be disqualified. Many persons who were registered by me as qualified voters were reported to me by various witnesses as being guilty of many acts of disloyalty; but said witnesses informed me that if they were to come before me and testify to the facts they would be compelled to leave their homes, and rather than do so, even under compulsory process, they would get out of the way. Knowing this, I thought it useless to attempt to forcibly bring them before me, knowing also that such a proceeding would endanger their lives.

Many good Union men informed me that on account of the threats and intimidation used against them, they thought it unsafe to go to the place of registering and voting, and did not do so.

From what I know and have seen since the passage of the registry law, I am fully convinced that there could not be a legal registration made in Calloway county under the circumstances as they existed at the time of the present registration.

Given under my hand this December 8, 1866.

JOHN YOUNT.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, if what is said on this list, under the head of remarks, is true, and what is said in these certificates is true, then, beyond all controversy, the vote of Calloway county should not be counted. But so far as the legality of the act of the secretary is concerned in rejecting it, it is wholly immaterial whether they are true or false. The law says to him "what you find on the lists shall be evidence of the facts there stated." He could not inquire as to their truth any more than he could inquire if an election had been held at all, that fact being stated on the return. Suppose the election return certified the opening of the polls on a different day than that appointed by law, or was signed by an officer not authorized to make return, or was not attested with the official seal, clearly the officer must reject the vote although the facts were otherwise than as stated.

But the committee says the supervisor had no right to make these remarks, nor certify as he did. Why not? The committee assumes the "remarks were made by the supervisor on the copy, and that they are not on the originals." I deny it. There is no word of evidence justifying such an assumption. On the contrary, the certificate says it "is a correct copy as furnished by the officers of registration," and no attempt is made to disprove it. The originals were in the same office in which the depositions of the contestant were taken, could have been and undoubtedly were consulted, and if such a discrepancy exists some allusion to it would certainly have been made. I take it for granted the originals contain all the copy contains except the certificates; certainly such is the proof.

And why not make the certificate? He must certify the facts or not certify at all. Again, it is either a certificate or it is not. If a certificate the secretary was clearly right in rejecting the vote, and if not a certificate the most essential element is wanting that constitutes it a certified copy of the registration, and without which the vote could not by any possibility be legally counted. Which ever horn is taken it results that the secretary was justified, as it was his duty to reject the vote given upon such a registry.

The committee assumes that these remarks have no place on the registry lists, and say that if made by the registering officers or the board of appeals still the secretary should have disregarded them. Such is not the law. The Governor is required to cause to be prepared the form of the book of registration of voters. He did prepare such form. The form so prepared was used in the registration of Calloway, and one of the columns in the form is headed "remarks," as is shown in the testimony.

These "remarks" are set opposite the names of seven hundred and thirty persons, and if true disqualify every one of them. These lists, with the certificates that they are true, are in evidence. This certainly makes a prima facie case against the right of this seven hundred and thirty to register. But as the case stands it is conclusive.

The lists are given in evidence by the sitting member. The contestant nowhere attempts to impeach them, although he had nearly all the registering officers on the stand as witnesses, most of them being his party friends, and could easily have disproved them if false. Had the lists been mutilated or any statement interpolated by the supervisor, as assumed by the committee, nothing could have been easier of proof. No attempt in that direction was made. They are certainly true. There is not a word of evidence, not even a circumstance, from which the committee is justified in assuming their falsity. It may be stated further that the parties against whose names these remarks were made were all or nearly all in the vicinity of the place where the testimony was taken, and might easily have been called in to testify that they were erroneously set down as "disloyal" or "bushwhacker" if such was the fact.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is over one third of the whole number registered, and nearly one half of all who voted proven by the lists themselves to be disqualified. They have placed their disloyalty on record. If that number is ascertained without any effort how much would it have been increased had the officers done their duty according to law and "diligently inquired and ascertained if they had not done any of the acts specified in the constitution?" Not a question was asked for that purpose. In some cases the oath was not even administered. Several officers swear they feared to send for witnesses to ascertain the facts, and the whole proceeding may be summed up by saying what is fully proven, that all who would take the oath of loyalty were permitted without question, let, or hindrance to register and vote. And not only so, but they were persuaded, urged, and advised by the whole party, of which the contestant is one of the leaders, that the oath itself was unconstitutional, null, and void, and the taking of it falsely involved neither moral nor legal turpitude. This point is further strengthened by the fact that no person in the entire county was rejected who would take the oath. I doubt if there is another county in the State whose list of registration shows none rejected. A small list is given here called the rejected list, but it seems to be made up of those too conscientious to take the oath. An oasis in the desert is cheerful in its appearance, be it ever so small.

The committee finally comes to the conclusion there was no reasonable ground to fear personal violence, no threatenings, no intimidation, and that the registration was legal, fair, and should be sanctioned by this House. The report says the registering officers were proven to be men of upright character, truly loyal to the Government, and some of them political friends of the sitting member. But the committee does not mention what the testimony shows, that every one of those who are proven to be the friends of the sitting member swear they were prevented from carrying out the law by threatenings and intimidation, and that, so far as their precincts are concerned, the registration is illegal and void. The kind of loyalty the others profess I will describe presently. An item or two from their testimony will be sufficient to guide the House in determining the degree of credit that is due to their statements. Isaac D. Snedcor, one of the registering officers and a witness for the contestant, swears that everything was quiet; that he faithfully carried out the law, and registered no man whom he knew to be disqualified. On the other hand, it is clearly proven that a number whose names appear on his list were not sworn at all, (a fact which he admits in another part of his testimony,) and that he had the evidence in his possession, furnished him by the supervisor, that one half or more of the whole number registered by him were disqualified. On his list appears the name of T. B. Harris, who lives in the same town, with whom he was well acquainted, and who was expelled from the State convention for notorious disloyalty, after full investigation and debate. Another name on his list is that of Jesse Garner, who swears he served in the rebel army, fought and was wounded at Wilson's creek, and that he told Snedcor of these facts when he applied to be registered. Still, in the opinion of the committee, Mr. Snedcor is an upright man, and his list should be taken without further question. The committee says he was appointed by Thomas, the political friend of the sitting member, but do not say what Thomas himself says, that no person could be found who would undertake to carry out the law, and, as a last resort, he appointed Snedcor. It was a kind of Hopkin's choice—Snedcor or nobody—which of itself shows the terror that prevailed there in respect to this registration law. His district was Fulton, the county seat, and where one fourth of the vote of the entire county was polled.

The committee says, what the evidence certainly bears them out in saying and what is not denied, but admitted, that everything was quiet during the registration. Of course there was no disturbance. The registering officers permitted all to register who desired to, therefore the disloyal had nothing of which to complain. The loyal were outnumbered more than ten to one and were utterly powerless. "Order reigned in Warsaw." But look at what was said and by whom prior to the registration. The leading paper of the party of the contestant urged the people to "organize, arm, and drill." Frank Blair and scores of others told them the oath was unconstitutional and the State had no right to impose it. A member of Congress, a leader in his party, told them to go to the registering officer and say to him, "My rights or your blood." A certain preacher of the gospel, with a very significant name—Burn-Ham—and of course all his descendants, tells you that he in a speech in the courthouse at Fulton exhorted "the people to go to the polls and demand their right to vote, and that the oath was not binding in a moral sense, but an outrage on the rights of freemen." This man of God evidently spoke by inspiration, and as "the spirit gave him utterance." The copperhead lawyers were profuse in their offers of aid should any be called to account for having sworn falsely or for otherwise violating the law. An ex-member of this House publicly proffered his services in this labor of love, "without money and without price." His puppet, a Teutonic Dogberry, whose mental caliber needs no "writing down," and who imagines that, like Selkirk, he "is monarch of all he surveys," proclaimed, de profundis, "Come unto me all you who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." A public meeting of confederate soldiers is called. They meet in Fulton while the registration is going on. Undoubtedly large numbers assembled, for in that county their "name is legion." They reconnoitered in force and find the work going bravely on. All is lovely and the coast is clear. No blockade, no obstructions, no man daring to dispute their onward march. The committee say they resolved not to vote. I see nothing in the testimony of any such resolve. It does say, however, they "did nothing." Of course not, for there was nothing to do. Their victory, though bloodless, was complete and decisive. The contestant comes here and demands its fruits at your hands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we can readily account for the quiet that prevailed there during the registration. The rebels were "let alone;" therefore there was no war. Verily, the committee is fully justified in saying, "All quiet in Callaway." There is another circumstance to which the committee attaches considerable importance. William H. Bailey, candidate of the same party, and upon the same ticket with the contestant, was commissioned county clerk by the Governor. This is cited, I presume, to show that the Governor took the committee's view of the registration, and in opposition to the secretary of State. If this were so it is more than offset by the action of the Legislature, which has twice, after full consideration, refused seats to persons sent from that county as members on the ground of its fraudulent registration. But the committee are in error as to the purpose of the Governor in issuing a commission to Mr. Bailey. That he may speak for himself, I send a communication from him to be read at the Clerk's desk.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 15, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I notice in the concluding portion of the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections, in the case of Switzlers. Hon. George W. Anderson, that some stress is laid upon the fact that I gave a commission to Bailey as clerk of one of the courts in Callaway county upon a certificate of election issued to him based on the election returns in that county in 1866.

In order that the fact of the issuing of that commission may not mislead any one as to the reasons for its issue, permit me to briefly state the objects I had in view.

Every man of candor, who is at all informed as to sentiment and political status of the people of Callaway county, must admit there has at no time since 1862 been two hundred loyal men in that county. I well knew the fact in 1866 that there were not two hundred men in that county entitled to vote under the constitution and laws of Missouri. The constitution and laws of the State had been mocked and defied in that election; and as the shortest way to have it so decided by the courts, I singled out Bailey and gave him a commission for the purpose of enabling those interested to bring him by quo warranto into the supreme court, and thus possess the court of the whole subject of his election, so that the legality of the registration in Callaway county could be passed upon; and that it was not so done was because there was no loyal man in the county who dared or dared to institute, or cause to be instituted, the proper proceeding.

I am, truly, yours,
Hon. J. W. McClure.

THO. C. FLETCHER.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the opinion of the executive of the State on this question. He lives in sight of Callaway, and knows the people and their antecedents. His testimony would be corroborated by that of every loyal man in the State were they called upon for an opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a citizen of Missouri for more than twenty years. I entered the military service early in the war, and was in at the death. I know something of the state of things there during the war, and something of Callaway county. It is my firm belief there are not to exceed two hundred men in the county qualified to vote under the constitution and laws of the State. It is not possible from the nature of things the number can be greater. There has been no increase in its loyal population since 1861, but rather a decrease, for loyalty flees from such associations as from a pestilence. In this opinion I am strongly fortified by the testimony of numerous witnesses. Mr. Turner, a citizen of the county for forty years, fixes the number at two hundred and eighty, the highest estimate of any witness on either side, (page 10.) Mr. William B. Miller, forty years a citizen there, says two hundred, (page 11.) Mr. Johnson says one hundred and sixty, and that he scoured the county and got but twenty soldiers for the home-guard service, (page 13.) Marcus Bird estimates the number at ten to the township, or less than one hundred in all, (page 16.) Forty years he has resided in the county; acted as enrolling officer under the conscription act during the war, a position affording him the very best means of information. Mr. Yount, who has a residence of thirty-one years in Cedar township, says not over forty or fifty in that township. The registry list contains the names of two hundred and twenty-seven. Mr. Turley, one of the registering officers, says one hundred and sixty-five in the county, (page 10.) Mr. Thomas, the supervisor, and well acquainted with the county, estimates about two hundred, (page 21.) The Governor says less than two hundred. It requires over five hundred in the county to elect the contestant, which is more than double the number testified to by any one of these numerous witnesses.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this ought to be sufficient to convince any one that the registration of the county was but little better than a farce and entitled to no respect, especially as they stand uncontradicted by a single witness testifying on the part of the contestant. But, sir, the case is made still stronger by the opinion of the contestant himself, given at a time when there was nothing to bias his judgment, when his duties called him to serious reflection on the subject, and with the most ample means of information. In the year 1863 the contestant was provost marshal under the conscription act of the district he seeks now to represent in Congress. As such it was his duty to cause an enrollment of the arms-bearing population of Callaway. There was great delay in the enrollment. Nothing unreasonable in this, considering the character of the people. Mr. Davenport, the recorder of the board of enrollment, testifies that heavy guards were required for the defense of the enrolling officers, and that much difficulty was experienced in executing the law. The contestant was reprimanded by the provost marshal general for his tardiness.

Callaway is still unfinished, and in his correspondence with the War Department the contestant speaks of that county as the South Carolina of Missouri, and says there are not two hundred loyal men in it. In this statement the witness says he fully coincided at the time, and is still of the same opinion. This should conclude the contestant and put at rest the character of the registry. In the face of all these facts—for such they must be held to be, for they stand uncontradicted by any witness; indeed, they proceed from the mouth of the contestant himself—how, in the name of God, can he come here and claim that a registry, the lists of which contain nearly twenty-one hundred names, is a fair, honest, and legal enrollment of the voters of the county, and should be so declared by this House? And how, Mr. Speaker, can the Election Committee reconcile their report with the precedents in more than one case when entire polls have been rejected and thrown out because the vote returned was so disproportioned to the known voting population as to stamp fraud upon it, and the legal and the illegal so intermingled as to render it impossible to separate the one from the other. I can account for it only by presuming that the onerous and important duties devolving upon the committee, and the numerous cases claiming their attention, have precluded their giving that amount of study and deliberation to this case which its importance demands.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another light in which we must view this case. It is difficult for those not familiar with the secret history of Missouri to understand the real situation of affairs there. They ask such questions as these: Is it possible that the people of a whole community will deliberately perjure themselves for the mere privilege of voting? Will human nature so far degrade itself as to call God to witness as true what they know in their hearts is false? Can it be that in the county of Callaway "all men are liars?" Have the sensibilities of men become so callous that without a shudder or a sensation of remorse they will knowingly and purposely set at naught the laws of both God and man and glory in the act? And if so, are the courts of justice powerless to correct the evil? Is justice so perverted and the law's delay so great that any attempt at its administration and enforcement is useless? The answer to all this is easy, and the explanation furnishes the key to this whole controversy.

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
That to be hated, needs but to be seen;
But, seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Who can point out the man who will admit he committed treason when fighting against his country and its flag? Ask of the thousands who were bound by oath to support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and who wantonly and purposely violated it, if by so doing they committed perjury, and you all know the response you will receive. Where has one ever been convicted of treason, perjury, or anything else by the courts? Take up the numerous cases of murder, kidnapping, tarring and feathering, and assaults of various kinds throughout the entire South and point to me one single case where punishment followed. Laws for the protection of persons and property always have been and still are dead letters in such communities when sectional or party feeling prompted their violation. So it is in Callaway. The testimony of numerous witnesses in this case shows that men took the oath and registered who had been in the rebel army. In at least two cases the parties themselves testify to it; and yet it would be "easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle" than to convict either of them. They must be tried by a jury who are birds of the same feather. The court is presided over by a judge who found no difficulty in reconstructing by the hundred in flagrant violation of the Constitution he had sworn to support. He had decided that "perjury was pious" when needed to overthrow the loyal element of the State. His courts throughout the entire circuit were engines employed in the interest of rebels and for the persecution of loyal men. But these men deny that in any sense they are or have been disloyal. From the highest to the lowest they claim, and have at all times claimed, that the most exalted patriotism actuated them. The Radicals are the traitors. The Radicals are the revolutionists, and in putting them down the end justifies the means. This doctrine is by no means peculiar to Missouri. Our ears are familiar with such talk, even in the Congress of the United States. With the contestant and his party the provisions of the constitution of Missouri, having for their purpose the disfranchisement of the disloyal, are nullities. The oath required is absolutely void and the taking of it falsely no crime. In the same light, I presume, he regards the oath he will be required to take at the Speaker's desk, should he be so fortunate as to be permitted to do so. At home he is cheered by the multitude in his denunciations of the body of which he is now seeking to become a member.

I have said these men deny the imputation of disloyalty. Such is true. I will give you a single case, and in this you have a sample of the whole, varying not in kind, but in degree. I will take the contestant himself. I select him not in view of any peculiarity his history presents which is not common to others of his class. I call upon him because he is already before us, and the proof is at hand. I have no disposition to misrepresent or deal unfairly by him, and certainly will not do so knowingly.

The contestant has long been a citizen of the State. He is a resident of the county of Boone, which borders Callaway. Boone is another of the central Missouri river counties, and the inhabitants rolled slavery "as a sweet morsel under their tongues." The people are kindred with those of Callaway. Although largely exceeding Callaway in population it polled less than half the vote of the latter county. Judge Barkhart's patent dispensing machine was kept under full head of steam in that county also, and contributed largely to the registry lists. The contestant for nearly a quarter of a century has edited and published a newspaper at the county seat, known as the Missouri Statesman. It has been and still is a leading paper with its party, and its influence with the people of Boone and Callaway very great. He has figured largely in the political history of Missouri for many years. Upon all the great questions of the day he has never been slow in placing himself on the record. In 1861, at a "time when men's souls were tried," he spoke out, and his voice gave no uncertain sound. He not only spoke for himself, but he spoke for the party which elected him in 1866, if elected at all. I have before me the proceedings of a so-called Union meeting held at Columbia, the home of the contestant, on the 6th day of May, 1861, which was largely attended; and its proceedings, which I will ask the Clerk to read, will give an idea of the character of the Unionism of Boone and Callaway.

The Clerk read as follows:

Union Meeting in Boone County.—Pursuant to public notice, one among the largest meetings ever held in the county convened in the court-house on Monday, May 6, 1861, to express their opinions in regard to the present crisis. At one o'clock the meeting was called to order by Colonel Switzler, on whose nomination Mr. James McConathy, sr., was elected president. On taking the chair, the President requested Colonel Switzler to explain the objects of the meeting, which he proceeded to do in a speech of considerable length; whereupon, on motion of elder T. M. Allen, Dr. M. R. Arnold was elected secretary.

"F. T. Russell, esq., moved that a committee of seven be appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting, and the chair appointed the following:

"F. T. Russell, Ishmael Vanhorn, David Gordon, Henry Keene, John W. Hall, Joel Palmer, Major James Brown.

"On the retirement of the committee, on motion of Colonel Switzler, Judge Curtis Field, jr., of Richmond, Ky., who was present in the audience, was requested to address the meeting. As, in his opinion, the crisis demanded that each State should decide for itself its own duty, and as he was a citizen of Kentucky he did not deem it proper to take up the time of the meeting with any remarks of his own, and therefore begged to be excused.

"Major Rollins was then loudly called for, and responded in a speech of an hour and a half, at the conclusion of which the committee, through Mr. Russell, their chairman, reported the following preamble and resolutions:

"Whereas civil war has been inaugurated in the United States, brought about by the extreme men of the North, and the extreme men of the South; and, whereas the State of Missouri occupies a position central between the two extremes, and has hitherto earnestly opposed all hostile demonstrations on the part of either: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the true policy of Missouri, at present, is to maintain an independent position within the Union—holding her soil and institutions sacred against invasion or hostile interference from any quarter whatever.

"Resolved, That we approve and indorse the reply of the Governor of the State of Missouri to the Secretary of War, in refusing to furnish troops for the purpose of coercing our southern brethren.

"Resolved, That patriotism and policy, and the preservation of the public peace, alike require on the part of the Federal Administration a prompt and immediate recognition of the southern confederacy as a government de facto and forming an alliance offensive and defensive with it for mutual protection.

"Resolved, That in our opinion secessionism is a remedy for no evil, real or imaginary, but an aggravation and complication of existing difficulties; but if we are reduced to the necessity of engaging in the present war and strife, that then we will stand by and cooperate with the South.

"Resolved, That to the end that Missouri may be fully prepared for any contingency, we would have her citizens arm themselves thoroughly, at the earliest practicable moment, by regular action of the State.

"Resolved, That as we hear that the border-State convention will be held at Frankfort, Kentucky, on the 27th instant, we therefore urge the delegates from Missouri to said convention to attend the same.

"Resolved, That we approve of the course of our delegates to the State convention, Messrs. Bast and Flood, and that we believe they truly and faithfully reflected the wishes and sentiments of those by whom they were elected, and that their action upon the important measures before the convention is fully indorsed by this meeting."

Mr. BENJAMIN. Commenting on the character of the meeting and the resolutions, the contestant in the issue of his paper of May 10, 1861, said:

"Secession Squelched Out.—Union Meeting in Boone.—We recur with great pleasure to the Union peace demonstration in this place on Monday last. It was unexpectedly large, enthusiastic, and harmonious. The people were thoughtful, dispassionate, and appropriately impressed with the solemnity and perils of the crisis in which their interests and the unity of the Government are involved.

"The speeches were addressed to the judgments and the consciences of the large auditory; were designed to inform the understandings and not to inflame the passions or prejudices of the people; were the momentous deductions of reason from the rapidly occurring and pregnant events of the times; were the lessons of history uttered in earnest warning against the mad experiment of secession and war. An intelligent patriotism pervaded them all and deeply moved the people. While they sympathized with the South in all its past wrongs and present perils, neither orators nor people could see that our safety was in secession. They could not see that southern wrongs, whether real or imaginary, could be more easily or certainly redressed out of the Union than in it. They could not see that our rights, oftentimes the sneer and foot-ball of Black Republican traitors, could be more speedily or thoroughly obtained out of the Union than in it. They could not see a single reason why the peaceful homes of our people, and their fair fields, now so full of promise, should be desolated by civil war—why this State, without a regiment on duty, without arms or munitions, defenseless, and $25,000,000 in debt, should be plunged into the direful vortex of secession and blood.

"Most nobly, therefore, and most enthusiastically did the people respond to sentiments of fealty to the Union for the sake of peace.

"We have never known a public meeting and appeals to the popular heart by public speakers to wield a more healthful influence. The old fires were awakened, and the proposition made plain to every man that our present safety was not in civil war, but in a position of neutrality within the Union. In fact, secessionism was squelched out, and Boone county to-day, if called upon to vote, would record fifteen hundred majority against it."

Here, Mr. Speaker, was a meeting of the Union loving men, loyal, patriotic citizens in the judgment of the contestant, held for the purpose of considering the situation, at a time when the contending hosts were marshaling for the conflict. Sumter had been assailed; the other forts in the South had been captured; your mints, your custom-houses, your ships, indeed everything you possessed in eleven States, had been wrested from you by armed traitors. Your army had been basely surrendered to the enemy. Your flag was torn down and insulted. Your power was scoffed at and defied. A government of traitors had been set up in your territory, and wherever one was found bold enough to raise his voice in your behalf death was his portion. Treason was rampant everywhere, and amid the din the loyal masses of Boone, led by the contestant, met and resolved that your outrages had caused the war, "that patriotism and policy" required you promptly and immediately to recognize the southern confederacy and form an alliance with it for offensive and defensive purposes. As if this was not sufficient, they further resolve that Missouri will hold her soil sacred from the tread of your armies; that her position shall be an independent one "within the Union," and if reduced to the necessity of engaging in the conflict at all then she will stand by and cooperate with the South. Not content with laying down the law to you and threatening you with her vengeance in case you refuse to obey, this valiant set of loyal patriots taunt you by indorsing the insulting response of the traitorous Governor of the State when called upon by the Executive of the nation for troops to assist in reestablishing your authority. "The requisition upon me is unconstitutional, revolutionary, and diabolical, and there are no troops in Missouri to aid in carrying on such an unholy crusade," said Governor Jackson to the President, and to this the contestant and other loyal patriotic citizens of Boone say "amen." Who says there are not twenty-one hundred loyal men in Callaway and one thousand in Boone after sending such a noble and patriotic resolve as this to you in the hour of your trial? Who says the doors of this House should not be thrown open wide for the reception of this loyal representative of a loyal constituency, in whom there is neither "variableness nor shadow of turning."

But, Mr. Speaker, the half has not yet been told. The war was commenced and the Government had indicated its purpose to disregard the thunders from Boone and prosecute it with vigor. Millions had declared their determination to uphold it in that resolve, even to the last man and the last dollar, notwithstanding all Boone and Callaway, including the contestant, had given you warning that Missouri's soil must be regarded as sacred, and if provoked to wrath her mighty power would be displayed in cooperating with the southern confederacy. Coercion had become a fixed fact. Your armies were being moved across the Potomac, and were occupying a portion of the sacred soil of Virginia. The contestant while sitting in his sanctum is told that it is whispered he has some little sympathy with the flag under which he was born. He waxes wrath that such an imputation of disloyalty should have gained currency, and in the next issue of his paper, bearing date June 14, 1861, appears the following emphatic denial. The Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No greater libel can be uttered against any public man than that we either advocate or favor coercion. We have denounced it from the start. President Lincoln's proclamation for seventy-five thousand troops was issued on the 15th of April, and on the 17th Governor Jackson responded for Missouri, 'that the requisition upon her was unconstitutional, revolutionary, and diabolical, and that there were no troops in Missouri to aid in carrying on such an unholy crusade.' We published Governor Jackson's reply, and said:

"Well done, Governor Jackson, there is not a man in Missouri untainted by the 'diabolical' heresy of Black Republicanism, who will not indorse you in this prompt and befitting refusal to respond to the unconstitutional and revolutionary call for troops by Mr. Lincoln. Hiscall, sir, is all you say it is—illegal, inhuman, and diabolical; and deserves the execrations of every true son of the South, every true friend of the Union and the public peace."

"There are no troops in Missouri, and we hope in no other southern State, to aid a Black Republican President in the butchery of the southern people. If there are in the South, and especially in Missouri, any such soldiers, they are on the wrong side of Mason and Dixon's line, and had better, for their health, take up their beds and walk—and walk fast."

"After Mr. Lincoln's perfidy to the whole southern people, and his execrable duplicity to the Union men of the border slave States, his call upon them for volunteers to aid him in blockading the ports, sackings the towns, and murdering the people of the South is most insolent and shameful."

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, one more extract will suffice. In the same number of his paper, replying to an article of a contemporary which spoke of the "loyal country" as being in deep gloom over the death of Colonel Ellsworth, the contestant says:

"We do not know what portion of the 'loyal country' is in deep gloom over the death of Colonel Ellsworth, or whether he was in truth a brave man or the contrary; nor do we know that Jackson, who slew him, was a rebel and traitor; but there is one thing we are assured of—he met a merited doom. He had no business, with a squad of armed Zouaves at his heels, to rush into Jackson's house before day, ascend to the roof of it, and tear down and attempt to carry away his secession flag. It was Jackson's private property, and was on his own house, and its being there was none of Colonel Ellsworth's business. Jackson did right in shooting him down for disturbing it; and our only regret is, that Brownell, who, from his looks, we have no doubt is a thief, was not also shot."

Extracts of a similar character I might multiply at great length; but it is not necessary, neither will my time permit. These are sufficient to show to the House and the country what loyalty means as defined by the contestant and his party friends. With few exceptions, no other kind has ever manifested itself in Boone and Callaway.

Here, Mr. Speaker, comes in a bit of history in connection with this branch of the subject. The contestant was a slaveholder at the breaking out of the rebellion and continued to hold slaves up to the time the Radicals of the State abolished the institution. At the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress a law was passed authorizing the enlistment of colored troops. It provided for the payment of $800 for each slave enlisted and belonging to a loyal owner. Some of the slaves of the contestant enlisted. President Johnson appointed a commission to audit the claims and pass upon the loyalty of the claimants. The contestant prosecuted his claim, which was rejected because of his antecedents. The record I have here detailed came up in judgment against him and was fatal. The commission was unable to understand how a resolve to fight with the enemy, a proclamation to those whom patriotism impelled to share in the strife "to take up their beds and walk fast," and rejoicing at the death of one of the bravest sons of the Republic, could be reconciled with true loyalty. I have before me a letter from the president of the commission, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1868.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiries of this date I can say, that in the winter of 1866 and 1867 Mr. William F. Switzer, of Columbia, Boone county, Missouri, filed before the commission for the State of Missouri, which was then engaged in examining claims for slaves enlisted in the Union Army under the act of 1864, a claim for slaves owned by him. The question of Mr. Switzer's loyalty was considered by the commission, and it was unanimously decided that Mr. Switzer's record showed him to be a disloyal man and not entitled to recover. Major John L. Bettinger, of St. Joseph, Missouri, and Judge Roswell Marsh, of Steubenville, Ohio, were the other members of the commission of which I was president.

I am, colonel, most truly, yours,

JAMES G. MILLS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It affords me no pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in parading so dark a page of the history of Missouri before the House and the country. Would that oblivion could cover it. I regret extremely to be obliged to confess to so loose a morality as permits a whole community to entirely disregard the laws of God and man. But more especially do I regret that any of her public men should make themselves liable to be thus held up to public gaze. But from such a record there is no escape. It will pursue them like the shadow of Nemesis. In the case of the lower classes it may be overlooked and forgotten, but never with the leaders,

"The bolt that strikes the towering cedar dead, O'er passes harmless o'er the hazel's head."

The whole issue, Mr. Speaker, is narrowed down to the simple question, What is loyalty? If we are ready to define it as the contestant has defined it, then he is elected beyond a doubt, and Callaway is loyal and has ever been so. If you define it as the contestant has defined it, the thousands whom you sent forth to be "welcomed with bloody hands to hospitable graves," "met a merited doom." But such is not the loyalty of the Radicals of Missouri. They have professed and acted upon a loyalty involving principles antagonistic to and inconsistent with such utterances. They have given it an entirely different definition in their constitution in its application to voters. He who "has ever by act or word manifested his adherence to the cause of the enemy" or "his sympathy with those engaged in exciting or carrying on rebellion against the United States," is not loyal according to that instrument, and therefore not a legal voter. Let the House judge between us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have done. I have endeavored to show, and think I have shown, that the vote of Callaway ought not to be counted. I admit the intensity of my feelings on this question, for I know the effect of its decision on the future of the State. The truly loyal struggled as none others struggled to maintain your authority and preserve Missouri to the Union. The blood of her sons has been poured out without stint, and their valor has been attested on every battle-field. She has been foremost in all the reforms that have characterized and shed luster on the age in which we live. The Radicals have the ascendancy in every department of the State government, and the future prosperity of the State depends on their ability to maintain it. During the war she was devastated and laid waste from center to circumference. Under the invigorating influence of Radical rule she has arisen like a Phoenix, and her waste places have been built up until scarcely a trace of the war remains. They have sped her on to greatness and prosperity with rapid strides. They have made her a home sacred to loyalty and freedom. They intend she shall remain as such. With such a record, animated by such a purpose, and struggling in such a cause, will you assist the enemy in accomplishing by fraud what they failed to accomplish in open fight? You will not do it. In the name of the living thousands who bore your flag and are ready to bear it again, I ask you not to do it. In the name of the "Veteran hearts that were wasted

In strife with the storm when your battles were won,

I entreat you to spare us the infliction. In the name of that liberty for which we periled all, suffer us not to be again enslaved. We established it. We can defend it with our own strong arms. Will you permit us to do so?

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the contestant desires to be heard it is not my purpose to prevent him, but I think this House in obedience to the decision made in several other cases should have the charges which have been presented by the gentleman from Missouri examined by the committee. The question which he has presented is one which seems not to have entered into this case in the examination heretofore given it by the Committee of Elections; and I am also informed if this question now raised shall be sent to the committee for the investigation, it can also be shown a sufficient number of persons cast their votes for the contestant who were actually disqualified by the laws of Missouri to overbalance the majority of the county of Callaway. Therefore for the purpose of following the precedents the House has already established, and in order that this new feature of the case may be examined by the committee, I move that the case be recommitted to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to the committee to examine into the charges made against the contestant by the gentleman from Missouri who has just concluded his remarks, and to report thereon to the House, with leave to send for persons and papers; and in order to test the sense of the House I call for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. For a moment.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Iowa means to do right; and when he knows what the right is he is as anxious to do it as anybody. I do not know what is the wish of the contestant, but I know the gentleman from Iowa does not desire to be put in the attitude the record will show he is put in by this motion. By the law of the United States these parties were required, within sixty days of the time when the commission was issued to one or the other, to state upon paper clearly and particularly, each one of them, the grounds of their accusation against the right of the other to hold his seat. They have done it, Mr. Speaker, and the sitting member has made no charge in the papers against the loyalty of this contestant. He took not a particle of testimony touching the loyalty of this contestant. He was heard before the committee at length, and at his pleasure, and at the end in response to the inquiry of the committee he stated he had no charge to make against the loyalty of this contestant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the end of three months and more after the close of this hearing and this report the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat has brought into this House what he calls evidence against the loyalty of this contestant, not taken according to the forms of the law, having no verification except the honor of the gentleman from Missouri, which I admit is as good as that of any gentleman. If this goes back to the committee there are no pleadings under the statute upon which this charge can be made. The gentleman from Missouri has, without the slightest hesitation, and I think without frankness—I have no doubt he thought it perfectly fair—produced here without notice to anybody, taken without any sworn verification letters that have been written to him or some friend within a few weeks, and read them here as testimony against the loyalty of this contestant, and thereupon, at a given signal, he yields the floor to my estimable friend from Iowa, who moves this be recommitted to the committee to examine into the loyalty of the contestant, and calls the previous question upon that motion.

I have no desire myself to be heard. I did not intend to be heard upon this question. The state of the thermometer and my own strength, as well as the patience of the House, forbid it. But I submit to my friend from Iowa that it is hardly fair for him to make this motion until the contestant himself has been heard. When he shall be heard upon this question, if the gentleman from Iowa shall feel it his duty then to move to recommit this case for the purpose indicated, I, for one, shall have no word to say. But there is a right and a wrong in the mode of proceeding upon this floor, and nobody would be less disposed to depart from it than my friend. Now, although he intimated in the beginning of his remarks that he did not know what was the purpose of the contestant, I submit that before insisting upon this motion he should see whether this contestant, brought up here after the sitting member has declared before the committee that he has no charge to make against his loyalty, has anything to say upon this new evidence brought up here at this time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It does seem to me, after the statement I made, that the gentleman from Massachusetts purposely puts me in a wrong position. He certainly could not have understood my position, which was that it was not my intention to cut off the contestant if he desired to be heard.

Mr. DAWES. I did not hear any such remark as that. I thought it was hardly possible for the gentleman, knowing him as I did, to entertain any such idea.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman had heard what other members around me did it would have saved him the trouble of delivering a lecture to me. Now, sir, he has made precisely the argument which supports my motion, and that is that the question of the loyalty of the contestant was not examined into by the committee at all. The case upon discussion in the House upon the report of the committee discloses charges by a member of this House upon the floor, affecting the loyalty of the contestant.

Mr. DAWES. If the contestant does not desire to be heard I have not a word to say. I rose in behalf of what I thought was fair dealing, and that was to give him an opportunity to be heard. If my friend had no intention of cutting him off, then certainly he has no occasion to say that I wished to lecture him; which was the furthest from my intention, for I know my friend would do no unfair thing.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hold it to be the duty of this House, in view of the precedents established in other cases, when a member rises in his place and prefers charges against the loyalty of a person claiming a seat on this floor, to direct the Committee of Elections to examine into those charges; and the fact that they have been made and have not been determined upon by the committee is the only support that my motion needs.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to inquire whether the contestant desires to be heard?

Mr. POLAND. I moved yesterday that the contestant be allowed to address the House, and leave was granted. He only desired to do so in the contingency that an attack should be made upon him of which he had heard some rumor. He does desire to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has but two minutes remaining of the hour. Does he intend to move the previous question, which will cut off the contestant and any member of the House from being heard.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is not my purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having reserved the call for the previous question, the contestant is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like to know by what rule I am cut off. Does the previous question prevail?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The gentleman from Iowa said he would not insist upon it if the contestant desired to speak. He has not said that he yielded to any other person.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the contestant does not desire to speak I shall insist on my motion.

Mr. MARSHALL. I insist in all fairness that this extraordinary proceeding should not be upheld at this time without an opportunity of some gentleman on this side being heard. The previous question has not been sustained, and I know no reason why I should not be permitted to take the floor in my own right for a short time.

The SPEAKER. There would be no reason unless the House should second the previous question, which would cut off all members of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the contestant desire to be heard, either personally or through some member? If so, I am for allowing it.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask to be heard as a member of the House.

The SPEAKER. In response to the gentleman's appeal, made three times, the Chair will state that the floor is in the possession of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] who has distinctly stated that he demands the previous question unless the contestant desires to speak.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I yield to the contestant.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish, before I take my seat, to be understood as protesting against this outrage upon justice. [Cries of "Order! Order!"]

Mr. PILE. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SWITZLER (the contestant) then addressed the House for an hour and a half. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1353) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named; and

An act (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah, and establish a land office in said Territory and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of privilege. I submit the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 678) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1869, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment after the word "laws" in line eight; and the Senate agree to the same as so modified.

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
Managers on the part of the House.
L. M. MORRILL,
GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
T. A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If any gentleman desires any information in regard to this report I am ready to give it.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire of the gentleman whether this bill, as agreed upon by the committee of conference, allows a pension in every case where a man has died while in the military or naval service?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This bill has nothing at all to do with that subject, but is a bill making appropriations for invalid pensions. The only point of disagreement between the two Houses was in regard to what should be done with the naval pension fund. We desired to have that fund put in the Treasury; the Senate desired to keep it out. We compromised by agreeing that it should remain as a fund at three per cent. interest in lawful money, which will yield just about the amount needed to pay naval pensions; so that it amounts to about the same thing.

The report of the committee of conference was then agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 355) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas; when the Speaker signed the same.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on sundry pension bills of the Senate, submitted reports, which were agreed to.

In reference to the following bills, the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House and agree to the same:

An act (S. No. 382) granting an increase of pension to Obadiah T. Plum;

An act (S. No. 422) granting a pension to Maria Schweitzer and minor children of Conrad Schweitzer, deceased;

An act (S. No. 517) granting a pension to the widow and children of Henry Brown;

An act (S. No. 518) granting a pension to the widow and child of John P. Fety; and

An act (S. No. 521) granting a pension to the children of William M. Wooten, deceased.

The House recede from their amendment to the following bill:

An act (S. No. 547) granting a pension to John Sheets.

The Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House to the following bills, and agree to the same with amendments, namely:

An act (S. No. 175) for the relief of Joseph McGhee Cameron and Mary Jane Cameron, children of La Fayette Cameron, deceased;

An act (S. No. 314) for the relief of George T. Brien; and

An act (S. No. 383) granting a pension to John A. Weed and Elizabeth J. Weed, minor children of Robert T. Weed, deceased.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the votes by which the reports of the committee of conference were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—SWITZLER VS. ANDERSON.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson; upon which Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How much time is there left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to one hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the sitting member [Mr. ANDERSON] desires to be heard, I will yield to him.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to have about thirty minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman for thirty minutes.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman first yield five minutes to me?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well; I will do so.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I merely wish to notice the statements made by the contestant in regard to my record for loyalty in the earlier stages of the war. He has read here certain resolutions, or what purports to be resolutions, and he says they were reported by me as chairman of the committee on resolutions to a certain meeting held in the town of Shelbyville, the town in which I reside, in 1861.

Now, I will say right here, in the presence of this House, and that it may go to the country, that there is not one word of truth in all that statement from beginning to end; not one word. I never participated in a meeting in which such resolutions were passed. I never was the chairman of a committee from which such resolutions were reported. I never voted for such resolutions, and I never indorsed them from the beginning of this strife to the end; and I cannot but think that the contestant is fully apprised of the falsity of these charges.

I am aware that a part of these charges were made in my district last year, and these questions came before the board of registration of my county where they were judicially investigated, witnesses being brought in and testifying under oath. And I happen to have the record of those proceedings here, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Leonard Dobbin being sworn and examined by Hale, testified as follows:

"I know General Benjamin, and have known him for many years, knew him in 1861; was present at the meeting alluded to; was secretary of the meeting and wrote out the proceedings, which were published in the Shelby County Weekly. I recollect that Mr. Benjamin spoke at the meeting a few minutes, not more than five or ten, and before the resolutions were introduced. John M. Glover was the principal speaker. Mr. Benjamin did not report the resolutions nor have anything to do with them. I heard him often, before and after that time, denounce Jackson as a traitor for refusing to furnish troops. Do not think he was present when the resolutions were reported and passed."

"William J. Holliday, county clerk, being sworn, testified as follows:

"I was not present at the meeting. Heard the resolutions talked about at the time, and often heard General Benjamin denounced them as treasonable and unworthy the county of Shelby."

"John S. Duncan, circuit clerk, testified as follows: 'I was not present at the meeting. I was for a long time before that time, and all the time since, almost daily in his company. Heard him frequently speak of the meeting and resolutions at the time it was held. He always declared publicly and emphatically that if every man, woman, or child in Missouri voted for secession, he would still resist and fight against it. Both before and after that time, I heard him denounce Jackson as a traitor for refusing to furnish troops. He certainly, from the beginning, was the boldest and most defiant out-spoken Union man in the county. I was very decided myself, but I sometimes thought he went a little further than was prudent. The entire Union party of the county looked to him as a leader, although but few were disposed to go as far as he.'"

Mr. BENJAMIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, that testimony was published through the State of Missouri. I cannot believe but that the contestant was cognizant of the fact that those charges had been investigated, and that he saw the published refutation by the witnesses who testified on that occasion, and well knew them to be false when he made the charges here to-day. I take this occasion to say that whoever affirms that from the beginning of the rebellion or long preceding its beginning down to the present day I ever breathed a word from which the enemies of our country could take comfort, tells what is infamously false, and knows it to be so. Sir, if the contestant or any of his friends will come in here and upon their honor as members of the House or as gentlemen make any insinuation that I have at any time favored secession or hesitated to favor coercion and the complete subjugation of the enemies of our country, I desire that the charge shall be distinctly made here to-day, that it may be referred to the Committee of Elections; and if the charge should be sustained by their report I would ask this House to expel me for disloyalty to the Government of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, resumed the floor.

Mr. POLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. I hope the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] will yield to the contestant long enough to enable him to reply to some personal assaults which have been made upon him by the sitting member.

Mr. POLAND. I hold the floor only by sufferance of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] I presume he will give the gentleman the time he desires.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in reference to the motion which has been submitted by the gentleman from Iowa. I do not now propose to answer at all anything that has been said by the sitting member in this case in reference to what may be termed the merits of the case, or as to the propriety or impropriety of adopting the report of the committee. I said yesterday nearly all that I desire to say on that subject; and if this motion to recommit the report to the committee should not prevail and there should be further debate upon the merits of the report, I suppose I shall be entitled to close that debate, and can then say anything additional which I may wish to submit upon that question. I now desire to say a word in reference to this motion to recommit and to treat it as entirely separate and distinct from what has been said on either side in relation to the legality of the registration in Callaway county.

This motion to recommit is based upon the ground that the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] standing here in his place and upon his responsibility as a member, makes charges of disloyalty against the contestant. Now, it is due to the House that it should understand a little of the history of this case before the committee, so that members may know how much there is of good faith in the motion which is now made.

Before the Committee of Elections the case of the sitting member was managed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] as his counsel, and in the course of his argument before the committee he made very much the same statements that he has made in his speech here in the House. But in the pleadings in that case, in the allegations and answers upon the one side and upon the other, not a word nor a syllable was contained in reference to the loyalty or disloyalty either of the sitting member or of the contestant; nor was there in all the testimony that was taken in the regular way one word upon the disloyalty of the sitting member. But, in the argument of the sitting member's counsel, charges were made as they have been made here; and upon the other side the answer was made by the contestant as it has been made here. The contestant undertook to carry the war over upon the other side, making the same charge against the sitting member and his counsel that he has made here.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman will recollect that when those charges were made against me I was not present in the committee; they were made after I had left.

Mr. POLAND. I presume the gentleman may be right in reference to that; I do not profess to recollect about the matter.

After the hearing of the case before the committee had been entirely finished, the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAVES] applied to the sitting member to know whether he claimed that the case stood in such a condition that in view of anything before the committee they could be called upon to act in reference to the disloyalty of the contestant; and the answer was freely, openly, and frankly given that he, the sitting member, did not make any such claim. More than that, in the minority report made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McCLURE] not a word of allusion is made to that point.

Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that when this question is sprung upon the House here for the purpose of getting this case recommitted to the committee upon this motion, it is perfectly apparent that it is a mere pretense put forward merely for the purpose of getting the case back into the hands of the committee and throwing it over into another session of Congress.

Now, I have no feeling about this case. If I am not able to satisfy the House that the conclusions of the majority of the committee are right upon the evidence, that our findings both of law and fact are just and right, and that every member of the House, Republican as well as Democrat, ought to stand by those conclusions, I am content that the judgment of the committee shall be overruled; but I do insist that it is not fair and just to this contestant, it is not fair and just to ourselves, to throw this case back into the hands of the committee after the explanation which has been given. I do not believe myself that there has been said here upon either side anything which amounts to a charge of such disloyalty on the part of either the sitting member or the contestant as to prevent him from taking the test-oath and acting as a member of this House.

I think it does appear there has been a good deal of political advance, and a good many gentlemen in Missouri entertain very much sounder and more correct political judgments now than they did a few years ago, and I am glad of it. I like such advances in Missouri and everywhere else; but I insist there has been nothing done here, nothing which has been charged in this debate which authorizes the House, and especially after I have given the history of the case, which has been repeated by the chairman of the committee, to take this proceeding. It is apparent it is a mere pretense, a mere subterfuge, for the purpose of throwing this case over to the next session of Congress, and I protest against it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the gentleman consider this a charge of disloyalty? I assert on my responsibility as a member of this House this direct charge, namely: this contestant uttered and published the words I am about to read, and he does not deny having written them or having published them on the 14th day of June, 1861. Then, I ask the gentleman from Vermont, in view of what has taken place in the Kentucky cases, whether this is a good charge of disloyalty? These are the words of the contestant:

"There are no troops in Missouri, and we hope in no other southern State, to aid a Black Republican President in the butchery of the southern people. If there are in the South, and especially in Missouri, any such soldiers, they are on the wrong side of Mason and Dixon's line, and had better, for their health, take up their beds and walk—and walk fast."

Now, I make that distinct charge, and I am ready to prove it by the paper itself which contains this in the leading editorial article. It is in the paper published by the contestant, and he does not pretend to deny it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have a word to say since the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] has resumed his seat, although I had not intended to engage in this discussion. I cannot permit the charge made by the gentleman from Vermont in connection with this motion to pass without notice. He says it is perfectly apparent this motion is a mere pretense to get this case back into the hands of the committee so as to throw it over to the next Congress. Of course that attacks my motive in making it; and I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from Vermont, while the laws of the United States exclude persons from this Hall who have given aid and comfort to the rebels, I have the right to have that law enforced; and whenever a charge is made by a member upon this floor of disloyalty I will endeavor to have that law enforced. If it is an improper thing for this House to say persons not eligible to seats here are excluded, then I have done an improper thing. I wonder the gentleman from Vermont regards this as an improper motion, and denounces as a mere pretense the effort to enforce the law in the county of Callaway, when we remember the report in the Kentucky cases. Taking the report as presented by the gentleman from Vermont, with the testimony taken before that committee, and I can come to the conclusion without difficulty that within that district were polled the votes of men disqualified under the laws of the State of Missouri from voting sufficient in number to overcome the entire majority that is reported in favor of the contestant counting in the county of Callaway; and I should like if this case should get back to the committee that the sitting member or any member of Missouri should ask to have that feature of the case reopened in order that it may be known how many of these persons not authorized to vote under the laws of Missouri did vote. I do not say whether it is a wise or unwise law, but it is the law there. I now modify my motion so as to recommit the subject, with instructions to inquire into the charges of disloyalty both against the sitting member and the contestant, and demand the previous question.

Mr. KERR. I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa that five minutes be given to the contestant to answer some personal charges made by the sitting member.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and yield for five minutes to the contestant.

Mr. SWITZLER, (the contestant.) Mr. Speaker, first of all, then, as to the opinion which it is alleged I, as provost marshal, gave in 1864 as to the number of legal voters in Callaway county.

The sitting member has seen proper to read a portion of the testimony of one W. W. Dav-enport, the chief clerk in my office during the year 1864, wherein it is charged that in a communication to the Secretary of War I expressed the conviction that there were not two hundred and fifty loyal men in Callaway county. Now, sir, this charge is an old acquaintance of mine. I have looked upon its features long ago, seen it often, and now desire, once for all, to give it a token of recognition. In March, 1867, the counsel of the sitting member, Mr. BENJAMIN, rose in his place in this Hall, and constituting himself a "smelling committee," to smell out letters of our officers, he offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with copies of any and all correspondence in his possession between Captain William F. Switzer, late provost marshal of the ninth district of Missouri, and the Provost Marshal's Bureau, in relation to the loyalty and disloyalty of the people of said ninth district or any portion thereof."

Well, sir, so far as I know the sitting member and his counsel have been "smelling" around the War Office, among the pigeon holes of that Department looking for this letter, a letter which I never wrote, and which is not to be found in my letter-book or in the archives of the War Office; and these gentlemen with all their assiduity have been unable to produce it. I deny having ever expressed such an opinion or ever having written such a letter. So much for that.

Again, the gentleman alleges that in 1864 I was removed from office by Mr. Lincoln upon charges of disloyalty. This is a new acquaintance; I never heard of it before. I was removed from office, so far as I know, without any alleged reason. I believe the reason to have been that upon the opening of the presidential canvass of that year I happened to believe, with many thousand ex-officers and soldiers of our Army, that George B. McClellan, who had exposed himself upon the tented field to the rebel hail of bullets and shells in the defense of the old flag, was as fit for the presidential office as his opponent. Because in Missouri I advocated his claim I suppose I was removed from office, and not upon any charge of disloyalty. That charge, like many other things in this case, has been hatched out here at the eleventh hour to serve a partisan purpose.

And now as to General Blair's speech. I am particularly desirous of correcting the gentleman in regard to the record of that speech, for I have it here. Once for all I desire to set the gentleman right, for I was present on the stand when General Blair made his speech in Callaway county. The speech was reported in the Missouri Democrat. The proprietors having sent to Fulton a stenographer (Mr. Wallbridge) for the special purpose of reporting it. Listen now to the counsel which General Blair gave to the people of that county pending the registration in 1866:

"I say here, in Callaway, that any man who attempts violence toward any officer of the law, no matter what he does—no matter how arbitrary and ridiculous may be his action—that any man here in Callaway, who attempts violence, is an enemy to the cause of the Conservative Union men. You never can get your rights by violence. That thing has been tried recently and has failed, and will always fail. The only way for us to obtain our rights is to abide by the law, live under the law, and make our enemies abide by it."

"I tell you that here, in Callaway, there must be no violence of any kind toward any officer of the law under any circumstances whatever."

"Now, I advise the young men of Callaway not to go round gasconading what they will do if the nigger troops come here. Let them come. They can't do any harm so long as you don't put yourselves in the wrong and give these men power over you; and don't let those leaders who misled you once before mislead you into doing anything that can't stand under the law, and I pledge you will come out triumphant under the law."

Is there any resistance to law counseled here?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now call the previous question on the motion to commit with the instructions stated.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. POLAND. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 46, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beatty, Benjamin, Birmingham, Boies, Bromwell, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Elia, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Logan, Longbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Perham Peters, Pile, Polesie, Pomeroy, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Bailey, Baker, Beck, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Cary, Chandler, Cook, Dawes, Dockery, Eldridge, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Johnson, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Moorhead, Niblack, Nicholson, Pike, Poland, Randall, Ross, Scofield, Sigreaves, Taber, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Aukca, Van Trump, and Elihu B. Washburne—46.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benton Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Burr, Cornell, Delano, Deweese, Dixon, Dodge, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Halsey, Harding, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Lincoln, Loan, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Nunn, Paine, Phelps, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart Stone, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—62.

So the motion to recommit was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NIBLACK stated that Mr. MUNGEN was paired with Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri.

Mr. AXTELL announced that he was paired with Mr. KELLEY, who would have voted in the affirmative, while he [Mr. AXTELL] would have voted in the negative.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 329) to amend section fourteen of an act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes."

Also, that it had passed a bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relative to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments.

FUNDING BILL.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tariff bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will my colleague allow me to report back the funding bill and to have an order made in regard to it?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, with sundry amendments. I desire to say that there are thirteen of these amendments. I wish to ask that the bill and amendments may be printed, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered tomorrow morning in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minutes rule, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will say after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that there will probably be no more morning hours during this session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There ought not to be.

Mr. GARFIELD. How will the order asked by my colleague affect the rights of the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to the bill for the reduction of the Army, now pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the gentleman, that when there is no other business before the House of a privileged character the consideration of the military bill will be resumed as the unfinished business, but when that time will arrive in the multiplicity of business the Chair cannot say.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose this motion carries, how will this bill stand in regard to the Army bill?

The SPEAKER. The House will go into Committee of the Whole on this bill immediately after the reading of the Journal tomorrow.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope my colleague will not insist on his motion. The Army bill will reduce the expenses of the Government $18,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object to this arrangement until all the appropriation bills are disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means have authority to report at any time, and the bill is before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the bill and amendments.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I hope my colleague will not insist on that. The bill and amendments will be printed by to-morrow morning.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand what I am about just as well as the gentleman does.

The Clerk then read the bill and amendments.

Mr. ROSS. I object to this bill being made a special order.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. My point of order is that the second section of this bill makes an appropriation, and therefore the bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, that this bill makes an appropriation and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHENCK. If gentlemen object to my proposition I must move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering this bill without being printed.

Mr. ROSS. I do not object to the bill being printed; only to its being made a special order.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 550) for the relief of Robert Ford; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 118) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the British-built brig, Highland Mary.

ELECTION CONTEST—McGRORTY VS. HOOPER.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to give notice that on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I propose to call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of McGrorty vs. Hooper, in relation to the seat of the Delegate from Utah Territory.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to a privileged question, I submit a report from a committee of conference.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 352, to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out the word "and" after the word "first," and insert the words "and third" after the word "second;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with an amendment adding thereto the following words: "And in any such case it shall be the duty of the President to make such designation without delay;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,

JAMES F. WILSON,

Managers on the part of the House.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

GEORGE VICKERS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. MARSHALL. As a member of this committee of conference I could not agree to its action in one particular, but I do not suppose that will have a moment's effect upon the action of the House. I merely wish to say that I prefer the bill as it passed the House in regard to the Patent Office. In regard to every other bureau the provision is that the chief clerk shall act in the absence of the chief of the bureau, or in case of a vacancy shall supply the place of the chief of the bureau and perform the duties of the office.

In regard to the Pension Bureau, the chief clerk has been discharging the duties of Commissioner of Pensions for a considerable time without any provision of law authorizing him to do so. But in regard to the Patent Office, there is a provision of law now in force, and has, I believe, been in force for about twenty years, that in the absence of the head of that bureau, or where there is a vacancy in the office of the head of that bureau, the chief clerk shall perform the duties of that office. Now, I take it for granted that it is a fair presumption that the chief clerk of the Patent Bureau has always been appointed and his qualifications considered in reference to the discharge of those duties. They have devolved upon him frequently during the last twenty years. I am inclined to think that at this time the officer filling that position is as well qualified as any under any previous Administration for the discharge of that duty. Yet in fact I know very little about that. But I wish to say this, that it seems to me that there is great propriety in the bill as it is now proposed to pass it. The provision is that in the absence of the Commissioner of Patents, and where there is a vacancy in that office unfilled, the President shall designate one of the examiners of the Patent Office to fill that office ad interim.

Now, it is known to the House that a considerable portion of the business of the Commissioner of Patents is to review decisions made by the board of examiners, and the result of the bill, as it is now proposed to pass it, is simply to allow an appeal from the board of examiners to one of the gentlemen sitting on that board. It seems to me there is an absurdity in this, and that it cannot remedy existing evils, if there are any. Under the present system, which is continued in this bill as to all the other bureaus, the discharge of the duties of the head of the bureau, in case of vacancy or absence, is left to the chief clerk. This has been the case with regard to the Patent Bureau for twenty years. This is my chief objection to the bill as proposed now to be passed.

I think that there are many difficulties growing out of the present organization of the Patent Bureau. Now, the appeal is from the board of examiners to the Commissioner of Patents, and an appeal lies from the Commissioner of Patents to any one of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the appellant selecting the judge and being obliged to pay to him in advance twenty-five dollars, his fee for hearing the cause. Now, the judges of the supreme court for the District of Columbia or of any other ordinary court, know little or nothing in regard to the patent laws or the practice under the patent system of our Government; but I think that we shall in fact complicate the system by the provision which is now proposed to be enacted, rather than simplify it and make it more perfect. For these reasons I have not been able to agree to the bill as reported by the committee of conference, and I have submitted these remarks for the consideration of the House with the hope that they may affect its action.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill was originally passed by the Senate. The House proposed as an amendment a substitute for the entire bill, the object being to provide for the performance of the duties of the officers of the departments and bureaus of the Government whenever there should be a vacancy and that vacancy should not be filled by the President in the manner provided by the Constitution and existing law. Now, it so happens in reference to the Pension Office that the Commissioner of that bureau resigned some time since. There was no provision of law for the performance of the duties except through an appointment by the President; and the President has not made any appointment. Being at the office the other day, I asked the chief clerk of the bureau by what authority he was acting in signing pension certificates, and doing other acts imposing obligations on the Government. He said he knew of no authority whatever under existing law, but that the Commissioner had resigned and gone away; and he, the chief clerk, thought it necessary that the business of the bureau should go on, and hence he was performing the duties.

The Patent Office has not been in precisely that condition, because the law establishing that office provided that the chief clerk should perform the duties in case of the death, resignation, or absence of the Commissioner of Patents. As this bill went from the House the provision of the original law was substantially reenacted. But the Senate, taking what is, I think, upon the whole a more practical view of the business of the Patent Office, made an amendment providing that whenever the office of Commissioner of Patents shall, by death, resignation, or absence become vacant, one of the board of examiners shall perform the duties. The House will do well to observe that there are in the Patent Office examiners who have original jurisdiction of applications for patents; and a board of examiners composed of three persons, to whom appeals are made from the special examiners when the applicant is dissatisfied with the judgment of the individual examiner. The amendment of the Senate provides that the President, in case of a vacancy, shall designate one of the board of examiners, now consisting of three persons, to perform the duties of the Commissioner for the time being.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Could we not insert at once the name of Mr. Foote, and be done with the matter?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very likely the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be prepared to do that; I should not be. When the conference committee met to consider as a practical question, in reference to the Patent Office, whether the duties of that office should be devolved upon the chief clerk or one of the examiners, I, for one, had no doubt what our duty was. In the first place these examiners are appointed on account of their scientific and mechanical acquirements, while the chief clerkship is a merely executive office for the transaction of correspondence and other like duties and business of the office. In the next place the examiners are higher in point of salary, and in fact they are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which is not the case with the chief clerk. They are ranking officers in the Patent Office as compared with the chief clerk.

As I understand the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] he inclines to the opinion this is legislating in order to put a certain gentleman in his place. All I have to say is that, hearing this rumor, I took pains to ascertain how the amendment was introduced in the Senate, and I found it was introduced in the committee on motion of a gentleman who has no sympathy with the view of the question suggested by the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and it was carried in committee against the judgment of a gentleman on that committee who might be supposed to have an interest under the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

As to what will happen I cannot say. There are three examiners-in-chief. By the amendment agreed to by the committee of conference, it is made the duty of the President of the United States, having been guilty of neglect in appointing a head for the Patent Office as for other places, to designate one of these examiners for the performance of this duty. On which of these three gentlemen that designation will fall I cannot say, but I believe either of the three gentlemen—and I know only two of them—I say I believe, from the nature of the case, from the duties they have been called upon to perform, that one of these three examiners will be better qualified to perform the duties of Commissioner than the chief clerk. I say this with no disposition to bring about the condition of things suggested by the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. McKEE. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKEE. I desire to know the reason for a different rule in regard to filling vacancies in the Patent Office from that in any other office? I see no reason for it, and the gentleman has given no satisfactory reason.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will answer the gentleman from Kentucky. The reason why a different rule should prevail in the Patent Office is very plain. In every other bureau the duties are executive for the most part, but when a Patent-Office question is to be decided in which the public is concerned it is a decision involving a knowledge of law and of the science of mechanics and long experience. The chief clerk, from the nature of his duties is not as well trained as the examiners for this purpose. By the very nature of their duties they are constantly disciplined in the examination of these questions, inquiring on every question of a patent whether it has been anticipated by a prior invention.

Mr. McKEE. I wish to say this in regard to this proposition, and especially concerning the chief clerk now acting as the head of the bureau. So far as putting a man into the office of the Commissioner of Patents to perform its duties, no one is better qualified than the chief clerk, who is now the acting Commissioner, the duty having devolved upon him by law. He was a lawyer for twenty years in full practice until the breaking out of the war, and after the struggle was over, after he had done battle for his country—

Mr. BOUTWELL. I must resume the floor.

Mr. McKEE. How can this bill give more efficiency to the Patent Office by putting one of the board of examiners into the place when they are subordinate and their duties inferior to those of the head of the Department? They are not better qualified than the present acting Commissioner, and besides it will allow an examiner to revise his own decisions.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not care to go into any inquiry touching the qualification of the chief clerk. These examiners, by years of experience, have come to understand all questions of law and mechanical science, and they are better qualified to decide them than the chief clerk. I say this without any disparagement of him.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot give way for a speech. I yield for a question.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say that I have no objection to this bill, but I do not see entirely the motive for this particular change which it proposes. I know that in the selection of Commissioner of Patents neither the President nor the Senate have exercised that care which would always secure a gentleman of mechanical skill, such as one of the examiners, of whom my friend speaks, possesses, and therefore the chief clerk is as likely to be competent for the office as most of the nominees sent to the Senate. But this bill alters the whole theory and—

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman's remarks are entirely aside from the question. To prove that heretofore the President has put men in that office who are not qualified is no excuse for us.

Mr. MYERS. I think my friend will allow me one word further. I have not made the assertion that hitherto there have been incompetent men appointed to that place. I simply mean to say we are as likely to get from the body of the people competent men as by taking an examiner of patents. But this bill alters the whole construction of the Patent Office hitherto, which has been satisfactory to the House. It alters the theory of the law and makes it entirely different as applicable to this office from what it is as applied to any other office.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL. I demand the yeas and nays.

On seconding the demand for the yeas and nays there were—ayes twenty-two; not one-fifth of the members present.

Mr. ADAMS. I demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the chair appointed Messrs. BOUTWELL and MARSHALL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes thirty-six.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 96, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Boutwell, Benjamin F. Butler, Cook, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Ela, Eliot, French, Garfield, Griswold, Hamilton, Higby, Hinds, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Judd, Ladin, Lynch, Marvin, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Pike, Pomeroy, Ross, Sawyer, Spaulding, Taylor, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Windom—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Axtell, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney, Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dockery, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, Getz, Grossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Heaton, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Mullins, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Polsey, Randall, Raun, Robertson, Schenck, Seefeld, Selye, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—96.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Bromwell, Burr, Cornell, Dewesse, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferry, Finney, Gravely, Halsey, Harding, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Nunn, Paine, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Poland, Price, Prunty, Robinson, Roots, Shellabarger, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Trichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—67.

So the report of the committee of conference was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the appointment of another committee of conference, with the understanding that I shall not be put on the committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Messrs. POMEROY, LAWRENCE of Ohio, and ELDRIDGE.

FUNDING THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in regard to funding the public debt.

Mr. RANDALL. I made the point of order that the second section of the bill contains an appropriation and hence ought to go to the Committee of the Whole, and the point of order was sustained. I maintain, therefore, that the bill is not now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustained the point of order, that the bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. That, however, does not debar the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] from moving to recommit the bill to the committee. When it comes up again the same point of order will apply.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that I shall make the same point of order when it comes up again.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the bill and amendments be printed, and recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, giving notice that I shall exercise the power which we have to report it back at any time tomorrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, and I will then ask to have immediate action on it, either in Committee of the Whole or out of it, as the House may determine.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. It would be considering the bill, and it cannot be considered in the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] has an amendment which he desires to offer, and which I include in the motion to print, and also an amendment which I propose to offer myself in a certain contingency.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would also like to have printed an amendment which I desire to offer.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, and, with the various amendments, ordered to be printed.

INDIANS AT DEVIL'S LAKE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with a letter from John Thompson, asking an appropriation of $17,061 43 for supplies furnished Indians in the vicinity of Devil's lake, in the winters of 1867 and 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CAPTIVES AMONG THE COMANCHES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, relative to captives in the hands of the Comanches and Kioway Indians, and asking an appropriation of $10,000 for the recovery of said captives; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I now move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tariff bill, and pending that motion, with a view to having an evening session for business, [series of "No!" No!"] I move that the Committee of the Whole may take a recess from such hour as it sees fit till half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the order for evening sessions for debate was made expressly so that a majority of the House might otherwise order.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that many gentlemen have signified to me their desire to speak to-night and I have promised them an opportunity to do so, supposing the House would not rescind the order.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I call for the question. The gentleman had no right to make such a promise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire if the gentleman proposes to have an evening session for general business or for the tariff bill only?

The SPEAKER. For general business; but the business before the Committee of the Whole is the tariff bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is no other business to be done?

The SPEAKER. There might be after the House come out of committee unless an injunction to the contrary should be made now.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I will make my motion distinctly for the purpose of considering the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to order that no other business shall be done.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the motion will be voted down.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I hope not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the House take a recess.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That will give an evening session for debate.

The SPEAKER. An evening session for debate only.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, and there were—ayes 64, noes 54.

Mr. MOORHEAD demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SPALDING and FOX were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported forty-two in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 64, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Cary, Sidney, Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fox, Grossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hulburd, Hunter, Johnson, Judd, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Ladin, Loughridge, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Pomeroy, Raun, Ross, Sawyer, Shanks, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trichell, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, Elihu B. Washburne, William Williams, and James F. Wilson—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Bingham, Blair, Broomall, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dockery, Driggs, Fields, French, Getz, Hill, Hinds, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Poland, Polsey, Randall, Robertson, Schenck, Seefeld, Selye, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Starkweather, Taylor, Trowbridge, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, and Stephen F. Wilson—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Bromwell, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chanler, Cornell, Dewesse, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Garfield, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Heaton, Holman, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Nunn, Paine, Phelps, Plants, Price, Prunty, Robinson, Roots, Shellabarger, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—72.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and according to order resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CULLOM in the chair,) for purposes of general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. STONE] is entitled to the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. STONE resumed and concluded his remarks begun last night. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HILL addressed the committee on the assumption by the Government of local bounty debts, and on retrenchment of public expenditures. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. MAYNARD then addressed the House upon the coming presidential election and the issues therein involved. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

BAY OF SAMANA.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, who said: I am indebted to my gallant friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] for five or six minutes, all that I shall want. The most I have to say is in the form of resolutions which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when in order. I ask the Clerk to read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Whereas it is now settled by a solemn decree of this body, that the treaty-making power is tripartite, consisting of the President, Senate, and Congress; and whereas this nation is greatly in need of a naval station and depot in the West Indies, and it is understood that several such very excellent ones could be had on reasonable terms if the fulfillment of the treaty were duly provided for beforehand, as now required by our settled policy: Therefore, the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for sufficient funds to purchase a convenient naval station and depot among the West India Islands, if the same can be had for a reasonable price, and to initiate a negotiation for the same.

2. And at the proper time to notify its coordinate branches of the treaty-making power, so that they may cooperate in completing the same.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it is gratifying to see by what a large majority of votes the Russian treaty was ratified by this House, although not in accordance with my judgment, who deemed it a perfect instrument before it came here; but the amendment of the sagacious gentleman from Iowa, with the concurrence of the learned chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has settled that question. I shall not complain, but hereafter conform my action to it. I know that more than one excellent naval depots of the best kind are now waiting our bid at very reasonable rates. And nothing prevents this acquisition but a doubt in the mind of our far-seeing Foreign Secretary of this ratification, and the consequent mortification of an obligation by this Government repudiated after its execution. Happily there is no such danger in the future, as the most potential part of the treaty-making power will have first assented thereto. I have said that, with some slight mortification at the adoption of the amendments, I nevertheless was highly gratified at the vote on the appropriation. To have refused to comply with the contract with such a Government as Russia would have been mortifying to every true Republican; for, besides the constant friendship which that Government has shown to ours, I look upon the rulers who have held the destinies of that great nation since the time of Peter the Great as the most remarkable race of sovereigns that ever sat upon a throne. The later members of that dynasty, for wisdom and justice, are quite equal to any of their predecessors. They had a very difficult nation to construct into an empire composed of Cossacks, Calmucks, and serfs. Of the latter kind the number was great, probably forty odd millions. That wise monarch saw that slavery, instead of forming the strength, was the weakness of a nation. He determined that every self should be free, and that in addition to their freedom their owners should do them partial justice by giving them small freeholds. He saw that to make them independent proprietors would make them more manly and loyal citizens. To create this great revolution without civil war was a task which but few Governments could have effected; and yet, with patience, courage, and uncommon wisdom, he effected it, and made every man within his empire free. We had neither his wisdom nor his courage; when a bloody war freed our slaves we had not the justice to give them homesteads, as we had a right to do, out of the over-grown landed estates and bloated accumulations of their former masters. For ages of unrequited toil we gave them mere enforced freedom and degradation, and now prevent their acquiring means of becoming independent proprietors. Such men cannot become useful citizens; such a government cannot escape the shame of their conduct. I cannot reproach myself with any of the blame. I early adopted the Russian views, but have never been able to succeed in them.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will my venerable colleague [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. If I heard the gentleman's resolutions aright, the preamble recites that the treaty-making power is tripartite in its nature; though if I understood correctly his argument upon the Alaska appropriation, he suggested that the treaty-making power was lodged with the President and the Senate exclusively, and that they having acted, their action was perfect and the duty of the House substantially ministerial. I wish to ask my colleague whether his resolution is presented in accordance with the general idea suggested by him in the same speech—that he desired, if practicable, to comprehend within this Union "all creation;" and if so, why he has not extended his resolution to the question of a depot in the Indian sea?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. As to my views upon the treaty-making power, I have not entertained and do not now entertain the least doubt of their correctness. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] with the concurrence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. BANKS,] appeared to my mind as, if it were not a harsh term, I would say an absurdity. I so regard it still. But that is no longer an open question. It has been decided by this House, and I bow to its decision, however erroneous I may consider it.

As to the remark to which the gentleman refers in regard to "all creation," I do not remember what I said upon that.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I do. Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. My colleague does. Well, he has a good memory. If I said, speaking of "all creation," that I desired all creation to be free, I have not changed my opinion. I still desire that the whole world should be as free as we are, and that we should be much freer than we are to-day. I desire that not only freedom but universal suffrage shall be declared a part of the birthright of humanity, a part of the inalienable rights of man, so that on both sides of Mason and Dixon's line every man who has a soul in his body may be recognized as entitled to the inalienable rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," universal suffrage being recognized as a necessary part of liberty, one of the essential ingredients of man's inalienable rights. These in brief are my views. I do not know whether I have answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. My colleague will excuse me; but his idea was, as I understood, to comprehend not only Alaska, but "all creation," within the limits of the American Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is entitled to the floor unless he yields.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to say a word?

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield for a moment. Mr. MULLINS. I trust I am mistaken in my understanding of the views which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has expressed in regard to universal suffrage and universal amnesty. If he meant to say (which I can scarcely believe) that a man cannot forfeit his rights under this Government by any treason which he may commit, I beg to differ with him.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will allow me to say that I never said a word about universal amnesty. I despise the doctrine.

Mr. MULLINS. The gentleman then confined his remarks solely to universal suffrage?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

PRINCIPLES OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic platform is a "whited sepulcher, full of dead men's bones." It is a monument which is intended to hide decay and conceal corruption. Like many other monuments it attracts attention by its vast proportions and excites disgust by the falsity of its inscriptions. The casual observer, knowing nothing of the previous life of the deceased, who reads this eulogy upon the tomb, might imagine that all the virtues, the intellect, and the genius of the age were buried there. But to him who knows that the life had been a living lie, an incessant pursuit of base ends, the stone is a mockery and the panegyric a fable.

It is my purpose to show, sir, that this Democratic platform is mockery of the past, and that its promises for the future are hollow, evasive, and fabulous; that it disregards the sanctities of truth and deals only in the language of the juggler. It is like the words of the weird witches, who wrought a noble nature to crime and ruin, and then in the hour of dire extremity—

"Kept the word of promise to the ear
And broke it to the hope."

What are the pledges of this platform, made by a party which now asks place and power for themselves and retirement and obscurity for us? They pledge peace to the country. Well, sir, the country should have peace. They pledge a uniform and valuable currency to the country. Sir, the country desires such a currency. They pledge economy in the administration of the Government. Judicious economy is among the first maxims of government. They pledge payment of the public debt and reduction of taxation. I agree that the public credit must be preserved at all hazards, and that taxation should be reduced by all means. They pledge reform of all abuses. Sir, when once an abuse is discovered no man will deny that it should be at once reformed. They pledge the observance of the laws, the guarantees of the Constitution, the rights of the people, and the promotion of the public weal. Nothing more could be asked of a party than that it should do everything which is good, and abstain from all that is bad. Happy indeed, sir, is that country whose rulers are all wise, all virtuous, all patriots, and all without ambition except to excel in worth and wisdom.

When such a party is found, Mr. Chairman, I shall support it no matter by what name it may be called; but until it is found—and I may be permitted to remark that it never yet has been found in history—I shall support that party which does the best it can for the country with what materials it has and makes up in good deeds what it may lack in polished speech.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I am an anxious inquirer after truth, and as I agree that the promises of this platform are many and seemingly fair, and likely to catch the eye and the ear of some who are unsuspecting, I am desirous of showing the basis upon which they rest in order that I may determine first how far I may trust to their performance. It is an inquiry that concerns not only me but all of us; but more particularly does it concern those who are to come after us—the young men of this nation who are now about to cast their first vote, and who will ultimately occupy the places we now hold, and be affected for good or for ill by the policy we may now adopt. No man has a right to treat this question lightly, and when we see a convention held by an adverse party it is our duty to criticise fairly but rigidly its acts, and to ask of what personnel it is composed.

If we find that its proclamations of principles are only a bait for votes; if we find that its resolutions are inconsistent, the one with the other, and all contradictory of the resolutions of previous years; if we find that instead of being a party promoting the prosperity of the country it is the party who attempted the life of the country; if we find that it is a party whose policy was suicidal in peace and fratricidal in war; if we find that it is a party which has adhered to no principle in times past except the principle of perpetuity; if we find that the men who now lift their voices as its leaders are unworthy men who bared their blades in rebellion; if we find there a gathering of all who are wildly ambitious, thoroughly unscrupulous, and dangerously discontented, then we may safely say their pledges are all false; and we may warn not only the soldiers and sailors but all good men, and particularly all young men, to avoid their snares and flee from their delusions. It requires an unusual condition of public affairs to produce such an unusual platform, and we require to know what that condition is before we can judge of it. Let us see what is the condition and what produced it. A very few years ago the Democratic party were in power. They had been in power for many, many years before. Whatever of good there was in their policy they had had time to develop it. Whatever of evil there was they had had opportunity to correct it. They did neither the one thing nor the other. There were no hostile armies then. The people imagined that there was peace. A few only believed that there could be war. But war was imminent. Under the surface of peace that party were preparing for war. In the council chambers of the nation they howled for war. In the different Departments of the Government where they were trusted and uncontrolled they were preparing for war. In the minds of the young and unsuspecting they sowed the seeds of war. In their newspapers they threatened war. In the lecture-room, in the college, from the pulpit and the rostrum they invoked war, and finally, when they judged the time had come when the nation was most helpless and the weapons of defense most useless, they made war, and war of what kind? Actual war, treasonable war, war against those who had loved and fostered them, upon codwellers under the same roof and brothers by birth and blood. How did war find us? It found us as the ship is found when pirates scuttle her, open to the mercy of the waves and ready to be ingulfed.

We had made no preparation for war. The military and naval establishments were on a peace footing, and even the skeleton had been disjointed. Treason was in the high places, and consternation pervaded everywhere else. That which might have been efficient in a pinch had been weakened by treachery or paralyzed by surprise. We had few troops, few guns, few forts, few sail, and few commanders. Scarcely a man in the North out of the regular service knew the first movements in the school of the soldier. The knowledge of arms had not been sought, and material and munition of war had sparsely been provided. We had no money to carry on a war. We had no policy declared to carry us through a war. But war, bloody, dreadful, disrupting, came upon us, and we had to meet it as best we could. The first thing was to get money. We issued the greenbacks. Whether that was the wisest thing to be done is not the question. At that time it seemed to be the only thing we could do, and therefore we did it.

But greenbacks were not sufficient. We issued the bonds of various kinds because we needed more money and we had to offer security of some kind for it, and that seemed to be at that time the best that could be offered. Whether it was so in fact or not is not now the question. They were issued and are not yet redeemed. Spite of all this we got heavily in debt. The war was a gigantic one. Armies were raised whose numbers astounded the world. Battles were fought whose slaughter saddened the world. Destruction of property followed whose amount might bankrupt a nation. But we were fighting for the life and liberties of this people and to solve the problem of man's capability for self-government; we could not stop. We were compelled to go on; and debt followed us as fast and as far as we went—heavy, crushing, appalling debt. Laws were defied, and we compelled their obedience. When the civil power was too weak we took the strong arm with the sword. States were insurgent and the people threw off their allegiance. We took the Government from those who cast it off, and we gave it to those who fought to maintain it. Our debts were falling due and we taxed the people to pay them. The taxes were heavy; but the debts were heavy, and the Army expenses were enormous.

In so far as we could we struggled to keep down our debt and to keep up our credit. What else? We found slavery had been a cause of war; but we found also that war abolished slavery. What next? We found those who had been slaves were true; and those who should have been true were false. We gave the slave a musket because we found he was a man; and we gave him a ballot that he might be a citizen. And so, sir, under these disabilities and against all these disadvantages we fought out that fight. We subdued the rebellion, we ended the war. And then, Mr. Chairman, what was the condition of affairs? We found the South exhausted, impoverished, and starved. We found her white male population fearfully thinned by battle; her black laboring population freed, but without opportunity to labor, and no resources for a livelihood.

Everything was dark, gloomy, and dismal. There was no money, no commerce, no traffic there. The races were embittered against each other, and the whites threatened to exterminate the blacks. We gave rations to the whites, and the Freedmen's Bureau as protection to the blacks. We afforded opportunities for employment; and we regulated the relations of the employer and the laborer. We protected the one and we encouraged the other. And when we could not keep the peace by the civil arm we resorted to the military, because we have had enough of war, and we determined that the peace should be kept. What next? We found that there were no governments in the rebel States which we could recognize; and we provided plain and merciful means by which new governments could be established.

This was the condition of the South. How was it in the North? We were oppressed with our debt; we were borne down with our taxes; we were perplexed how to pay the first, and how to reduce the latter. But our hearts were all glad notwithstanding, because we had saved our country. We mourned for those we had lost, but we rejoiced for those who were to come, for we had solved the problem of liberty and the destiny of our people. We set ourselves immediately to repair the ravages of war. At the close of the war, by the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated December 3, 1866, our indebtedness on the 31st day of August, 1865, was $2,846,021,742 04; on the 1st day of June, 1868, by the report of the same official, our indebtedness was $2,510,245,886 74, being a reduction of the national debt since August 31, 1865, to June 1, 1868, of $335,775,855 30, showing a reduction of our national debt of over one hundred millions per annum. Under a Republican Congress could we have had an Executive and Cabinet in harmony with Congress so that frauds and robberies of the revenues could have been stopped, in my judgment the whole country would be at peace, and our debt reduced at least $500,000,000. We now propose to reduce the Army and Navy as rapidly as can be done with safety to the country, and all other expenses of the Government. We have also, as fast as State after State organizes its government, abolished military authority and subordinated it to the civil, and abolished the Freedmen's Bureau, to take effect the 1st of next January.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a brief statement of the condition of our country since 1860. I have been brief in stating, because I did not wish to tell an oft-told tale. I have only sketched those events which have given rise to the pledges and complaints of the Democratic platform. Now, sir, when a nation finds itself thus suddenly engaged in an unforeseen war, and thus unexpectedly is called upon for all its resources, and emerges from the struggle victorious but fatigued, strong but wearied, it is certainly entitled to some forbearance, and its supporters should meet with some encouragement and praise. This remark brings me to my first allegation against this platform. I allege against it that it makes a specious and a false complaint against us for doing the only thing which it was in our power to do, and the only thing which any other party, Republican or Democratic, could have done, unless they made an ignominious peace with the rebels! No other set of men, be their politics what they might, could have done aught other than we did do, if they were patriots and fought the battle of the country! I allege against it, also, that the very men who now make this complaint were either the identical men, or else the partisan friends and adherents of the identical men who brought on this war, who fought the flag, who caused the debt, and who were the immediate occasion of all our sorrow and of all our burdens!

It is not true, then, that the Democratic party will give peace to the country. They have been the party of war, and by the written declarations of their candidate for Vice President they propose more war unless they can undo all the victory we have achieved, and renew rebellion where we have quieted it. I read, Mr. Chairman, a letter written by Major General F. P. Blair, to Colonel Broadhead, of St. Louis:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1868.

DEAR COLONEL: In reply to your inquiries I beg leave to say that I leave to you to determine, on consultation with my friends from Missouri, whether my name shall be presented to the Democratic convention, and to submit the following as what I consider the real and only issue in this contest:

The reconstruction policy of the Radicals will be complete before the next election; the States so long excluded will have been admitted, negro suffrage established, and the carpet-baggers installed in their seats in both branches of Congress. There is no possibility of changing the political character of the Senate, even if the Democrats should elect their President and a majority of the popular branch of Congress. We cannot, therefore, undo the Radical plan of reconstruction by congressional action; the Senate will continue a bar to its repeal. Must we submit to it? How can it be overthrown? It can only be overthrown by the authority of the Executive, who is sworn to maintain the Constitution, and who will fail to do his duty if he allows the Constitution to perish under a series of congressional enactments which are in palpable violation of its fundamental principles.

If the President elected by the Democracy enforces or permits others to enforce these reconstruction acts, the Radicals, by the accession of twenty spurious Senators and fifty Representatives, will control both branches of Congress, and his Administration will be as powerless as the present one of Mr. Johnson.

There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives. The House of Representatives will contain a majority of Democrats from the North, and they will admit the Representatives elected by the white people of the South, and with the cooperation of the President it will not be difficult to compel the Senate to submit once more to the obligations of the Constitution. It will not be able to withstand the public judgment, if distinctly invoked and clearly expressed on this fundamental issue, and it is the sure way to avoid all future strife to put the issue plainly to the country.

I repeat that this is the real and only question which we should allow to control us: Shall we submit to the usurpations by which the Government has been overthrown, or shall we exert ourselves for its full and complete restoration? It is idle to talk of bonds, greenbacks, gold, the public faith, and the public credit. What can a Democratic President do in regard to any of these, with a Congress in both branches controlled by the carpet-baggers and their allies? He will be powerless to stop the supplies by which idle negroes are organized into political clubs—by which an army is maintained to protect these vagabonds in their outrages upon the ballot. These, and things like these, eat up the revenue and resources of the Government and destroy its credit—make the difference between gold and greenbacks. We must restore the Constitution before we can restore the finances, and to do this we must have a President who will execute the will of the people by tramping into dust the usurpation of Congress, known as the reconstruction acts. I wish to stand before the convention upon this issue, but it is one which embraces everything else that is of value in its large and comprehensive results. It is the one thing that includes all that is worth a contest, and without it there is nothing that gives dignity, honor, or value to the struggle.

Your friend, FRANK P. BLAIR.
Colonel JAMES O. BROADHEAD.

Is this the language of peace? Is this the pledge of security to the country? Is this the return to the settled pursuits of civil life and the calm routine of trade, which shall reassure our people and restore our prosperity? Does it not rather suggest the clarion-trump and the clash of arms—the neigh of steed and the shriek of death? Are our taxes to be lessened under these threats? Will our credit be made better by these means? Gentlemen shall not tell me that this is not an utterance of the party nor a binding declaration. The letter was written before the convention met, in view of its meeting, and in order to bring the writer and his doctrines before that convention as a candidate. Both aims were attained. The letter was published—the writer was nominated. The doctrines are his and his party's, and are embodied in the platform by the declaration that "we regard the reconstruction acts (so called) as usurpations, and unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void." It seems, then, from this that all we have done is to be undone. No matter that the voice of the country in election after election, year after year, has sanctioned it and said it was well done, the Democratic party says it must be undone, or that the sword shall be unsheathed and desolation sweep over the land.

Where, now, are the pledges of specie payment, of redeemed bonds, of equal currency, of wise legislation, of amicable feeling, of restored confidence, of judicious economy, and reduced taxation? Gone! gone! The loud note of insurrection has dispelled them all, and the possibility of our national Parliament being dissolved by the sword, as in Cromwell's day, has put all lingering hope to flight. We are promised a uniform and valuable currency—one currency—which is to be sufficient "for the Government and the people, the laborer and the office holder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder." We are promised "payment of the public debt as rapidly as practicable." We are notified of "equal taxation of every species of property, including bonds and other securities." We are to expect "economy in the administration of the Government," and the "abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau." How is all this to be brought about? For fear I may do injustice to the platform, I wish to quote some extracts from the World newspaper of July 8, the day after the platform was made. I may add that the World is the authoritative exponent of the views of the distinguished gentleman Horatio Seymour, who has been nominated for President by that party, and therefore this interpretation is his interpretation:

"The declarations relating to the finances are scattered through different sections of the platform. They need to be brought together before we can get an intelligent view of their scope. The platform is explicit enough upon each particular point, but its several declarations so limit and modify one another that it would be very misleading to consider any one of them apart from the rest."

It is somewhat singular, if this document was all fairness and honesty, that its different subjects could not be put close enough together to afford an "intelligent view" of each, and "its declarations are so misleading" as to require an expert like the World to bring them together in harmony. Why is it that "its several declarations limit and modify one another" if these are the declarations and the principles upon which our people are asked to stake their happiness?

But, says the World, this is what it means:

"Payment of the principal of the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks will easily be found in the platform, if searched for. The language is that 'when the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right and in justice to be paid in the lawful money of the United States,' that is to say, in greenbacks. This is explicit enough so far as it relates to the medium of payment; but how does the platform propose to provide the means? In other words, where are the greenbacks to come from? On this also the platform is explicit. They are not to be manufactured by the printing-press, but to be raised by taxation. By this method the payment of the public debt cannot be very rapid. The bondholders need have no fear that their property is to be swept away by a new inundation of paper money. Payment of the public debt in greenbacks without increasing their present amount, payment in greenbacks out of the proceeds of a reduced taxation, will leave the greater portion of the debt standing for many years to come."

Two things appear from this: first, that the payment of the public debt cannot be very rapid; and second, that the greenbacks wherewith to pay it are to be raised by taxation. This is a novel way indeed to "equalize the currency" and to "reduce taxation." We are to be taxed additionally to pay the public debt, and to be taxed a long time to come before it can be discharged, and the Democracy call this "reform of an existing abuse." There is another fact concealed in this statement which it were well to bring to light. We have heard that much of our miseries are due to the "bloated bondholder." They are lepers who have infected us in our persons and tainted our financial atmosphere. But they are assured by this platform that "they need have no fears that their property is to be swept away by a new inundation of paper money."

If these bonds are vile as they say, why should they not be swept away under a Democratic dispensation? We do not think they are; but if we are to rely on Democratic testimony they are the gangrene of our body-politic. Again, if there is to be no "new inundation of paper money," how are the greenbacks to be raised, which, levied in taxation, are to pay off the national debt? First, it is said, they will raise greenbacks by taxation and pay off the bonds. It must be admitted that the greenbacks already in circulation are not adequate for this, and so more must be issued. But next it is said that there will be no more issued. Then how are the bonds to be paid? It may be that this is all clear to other eyes, and that the end will certainly be reached by the means; but I trust I may be pardoned if I confess at once that I am not able to take that "intelligent view" which shows me how it is to be done. It seems, too, that the World has the same opacity as myself if its vision is confined to this point, and so it takes another stretch:

"There is another part of the platform which has a pertinent bearing on this subject. It is the declaration in favor of 'one currency for the Government and the people, for the bondholder and the producer.' Now, although nothing is expressly said upon that point, we suppose the platform contemplates the payment of the duties on imports in coin as heretofore. This seems to us a justifiable, nay, an inevitable inference from what is said about paying in coin such obligations of the Government as stipulate for coin upon their face. The interest upon both the ten-forty and the five-twenty bonds is payable in coin by the very terms of the law, and also the principal of the ten-forties. If the Government keeps this express engagement, it must by some means raise the coin, and no other method is suggested than by collecting it, as now, at the custom-houses. Now, as the platform pledges the party to pay specie to the bondholders to meet their interest and that part of their principal which the law requires to be paid in coin, it seems evident that the 'one currency for the Government and the people, the bondholder and the producer,' must contemplate an early return to specie payments. The 'one currency' must mean either a uniform good currency or a uniform bad currency. It is inconceivable in itself and inconsistent with the platform, that the old, hard-money Democratic party should promise a uniform currency of bad money. The one currency means a sound currency; a currency equivalent to coin and at all times exchangeable for it. One currency of depreciated greenbacks would be inconsistent with the payment in coin of that part of the public obligations which are acknowledged by the platform to be due in coin; inconsistent with the collection of the revenue from imports in gold; inconsistent with the idea that we are ever to return to specie payments.

"Another declaration, in still another section of the platform, evinces an intention to make an early return to specie payments. After calling for a reduction of the public expenses and a reform of the system of taxation, the platform proceeds thus: 'So that the burden of taxation may be equalized and lessened, the credit of the Government and the currency made good.' The credit of the Government is not 'good' so long as its promises sell for less than their face; the currency is not 'good' so long as it is inflated and irredeemable.

"The platform proposes to pay the five-twenties in greenbacks; proposes to raise the money for this purpose by taxation; promises unequivocally that 'the burden of taxation shall be lessened;' the credit of the Government made good; the currency made good; and that that good currency shall be the same for all classes, including the bondholders. We do not regard these several declarations as contradictory, but as mutually explanatory, perfectly consistent, and harmonious. The Democratic party is pledged by the platform to appreciate the greenbacks to par and use them for the payment of that part of the public debt which is not by express provision of law due in coin."

Now, having got all the light of which the subject is capable, let us see exactly what it is that is promised by these reformers. They say to the people, "The bloated bondholder is eating out your substance, and we will tax his property just as we tax yours." They say to the bondholder, "Have no fears for your bonds; we will issue no more greenbacks to depreciate them; and we will pay them in a good and lawful currency. If it is not gold it shall be as good as gold." They say to the people, "We will reduce your taxes." They say to the capitalist, "We will pay our debts by taxation." They say to the people, "We will have but one currency for all alike, and that shall be greenbacks." They say to the creditor, "We will pay you in gold, as the law requires; but we will make the greenback of the value of gold if we can." And then they say to all, to the bondholder and the people, the pensioner and the soldier, the laborer, the office-holder, and the producer, "We will reform all abuses; we will equalize taxation by a uniform currency; we will pay the bonds in gold, or greenbacks at par; and we will pay off our debts." When? After many years to come!

So, Mr. Chairmau, admitting that all this is to be brought about in the very letter and spirit of the promise, it appears that the first condition of its fulfillment is, that the Democratic party shall have unlimited power for many years to come, or else it cannot keep its word. If it should be asked what recourse or remedy will the people have if, after having given that power to that party for many years to come, those promises should not be kept, these pledges should not be fulfilled, I am at a loss to reply; I do not find any remedy stated in the platform; I am not aware of any recourse. Still, however, it may be impertinent and useless also to make the inquiry or to seek for redress. A ruined debtor, bankrupt to the last farthing, need trouble himself but very little as to the disposition of the assets which he has not got. This, then, sir, is the much-vaunted financial policy which is to be inaugurated by the Democratic party, and through which this country is to be rescued from all her present difficulties. This is the key-note of their complaint, and the battle cry of their campaign.

It is a platform which was made to suit a candidate who was defeated for the nomination. The platform was made for one man, but that man is not the one who is standing on it. The man who wanted that platform did not get the nomination, and the man who did get the nomination did not want that platform. It is not of record that like another memorable candidate of by-gone years "he spit upon it." Indeed, his well-known habits of decorum and aristocratic breeding forbid the possibility of such a thing. But it is of record that he made two earnest and powerful speeches to prevent the enunciation of a doctrine which he knew was absurd in the present and would be falsified in the future. If, then, their financial declarations are vague and false how can we trust aught else they say? The country wants peace; through peace will come prosperity. Prosperity thrives under a Government of fixed principles, and principles are most firmly fixed when they are most generally and best understood by the people at large. If their finances fail all else fails. Now, what do they say upon another most essential and remunerative branch of the national finances—that branch which is now and must continue to be the only gold-yielding portion of our revenue—I mean the tariff? I quote again, sir, from the World:

"There is only one other subject embraced in the platform which seems to call for any remark, and that is the tariff, or 'protection.' This part of the platform is a muddle. The language is: 'a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports,' which is good sound Democratic doctrine, but it is immediately followed by this unintelligible jumble: 'and such equal taxation under the internal revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures.' We are here treated to the paradox of a revenue tariff and protective internal taxes. But the wonder does not end here. A protective tariff discriminates, but internal taxes are to protect without discriminating. It is 'equal' internal taxes that are to accomplish the feat of protecting domestic manufactures. If all interests are taxed alike, how can any be protected? What are they to be protected against? Not against foreign rivals by internal taxes; not against domestic competition by equal taxes. The promise of a tariff for revenue is excellent; all beyond that is nonsense."

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that it is not I who says that this is a muddle, an unintelligible jumble, a paradox, and nonsense, but the leading Seymour paper in the United States.

I turn now to another topic, and still I quote the "World":

"All that the Democratic party promise to do in relation to negro supremacy is comprised in these words: 'the reduction of the standing Army and Navy, the abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau, and all political instrumentalities designed to secure negro supremacy.' The Freedmen's Bureau, with the Army to back it, is a tremendous electioneering machine intended to control the negro vote. When it is abolished, the negro vote will fall under the control of the white citizens of the South, and there will then be no difficulty in carrying all the southern States for the Democratic party."

That is, the Freedmen's Bureau is an outrageous institution, because it prevents the Democratic party from controlling the negro vote and getting supremacy in every southern State; that is to say, the Freedmen's Bureau would be all right if it were in Democratic hands and the negro will be a good enough man to vote so soon as he can be got to vote the Democratic ticket. The World further adds:

"The platform promises to smash the political machine called the Freedmen's Bureau and all other Federal agencies for controlling the southern elections—but beyond this it wisely promises nothing in relation to negro suffrage. It promises that the Federal Government shall not interfere to cajole the negroes into voting against the interests of their section, and trusts to the natural ascendancy of white intelligence to accomplish whatever else may be deemed expedient. In this matter the platform is equally wise in what it promises and in what it abstains from promising."

In other words, it is admirable, because it is so happy in suppressing the truth to an extent as great as in suggesting a falsehood; and this, sir, is the whole of it beyond the usual quantity of empty phrases. "Full of sound and fury, and signifying nothing," with which from time immemorial the Democratic party have been in the habit of garnishing their platforms. I might make a closer analysis of it all; and I think I might make a stronger show of its utter worthlessness; but I am content to accept the rendition of the World, in order that I may not be charged with partisan prejudice. I take the World because it is the word.

It explains the deed for him who is to perform it; and surely where we decide evidence of intention and of faith, we can ask for nothing stronger than the word and the deed combined. But I have not done yet. I desire with your indulgence to go a little behind the promise to inquire as to the character of those who make the promise. It is an axiom with all business men that the value of a note is determined not at all by what it promises to to pay, but wholly and exclusively by the character of the makers and indorsers. I wish to inquire, Mr. Chairman, who are the men that made up that Democratic convention, and who are the men who indorsed its candidates? I have already referred to the men who in the time of peace plotted war. I have shown how it was that this country became charged with its load of debt. I have dwelt upon the struggles and the difficulties of that hour, and the wails and the woes of our mourners. I have stated how we did all that we did, because it was the only thing to do. I have shown how we wrestled with our adversity, and finally how we overcame our enemies. We bore the brunt of arms for the sake of our country, and to uphold its Constitution, its laws, and its liberties. We had but one desire, and that was "Peace to our country." We had but one anxiety, and that was to preserve intact this chosen land. Well, sir, as I said, the war was over and the victory was ours. There was no longer a rebel in arms. They had dispersed, as we supposed, never to meet again.

But, sir, we were mistaken. They have met again. Where? Why, this time upon northern soil, and in a northern city, in the city of New York, the great metropolis of this country, in the Democratic convention. I do not say that every man who met there had been a rebel; but I do say that all the rebels met there who are now leading in public life, and who hope for public position. It was the same old story over again. The same old faces to see. The men who had held this Government for years and plotted to destroy it while they held it were there. The men who fought to destroy this Government when they could no longer hold it were there. The men who though they had never plotted to destroy it or fought against it, yet quietly acquiesced in the designs of those who did, were there. The men who have always given blind allegiance to the behest of party regardless of the good of the country, were there. The men who have always been the praters and croakers and false prophets of the country were there; and a few men who had once served their country, but were lured off by fatal ambition and the hope of spoils were there. Good men may have been there; but bad men were most certainly there; and just as certainly the bad outnumbered the good; and these are the men, sir, who complain of us. These are the men who say we have violated the law and have usurped the Constitution. We have told them to the contrary many and many a time. In these very Halls, before they deserted their places, we assured them that we desired nothing but the law and the Constitution. After they had erected their first batteries, and before they fired on Fort Sumter, they were again assured that the law and the Constitution should be kept inviolate. Even after they had waged their fiercest war upon us the President of the United States once more proclaimed that we fought only to protect the Constitution and the laws.

Again and again, by the camp-fire, under the flag of truce and in the hospitals, and in exchange of prisoners and in parleys and communications they were made acquainted with the fact that we had but one object, and that was to enforce the Constitution and the laws. And yet again, sir, when the battle was at a white heat, and strong arms and strong hearts wrought wounds and death, when the air was filled with lamentations and pierced by cries of agony, when the greedy earth drank up the gushing blood of our bravest and our best, we still advanced but the one standard, which was the old starry banner, emblematic of the Constitution, the laws, our unity and strength. Ah, sir, it must have been a humiliating scene at that convention. Were the loyal soldiers and citizens of this country looking on when the rebel General Preston nominated the former Union General Blair? Did the loyal sailors and soldiers hear the rebel Wade Hampton second the nomination? Did the rank and file of the loyal men listen to the butcher of Fort Pillow—Forrest? Where were then the memories of former treacheries, of a nation undone and a Constitution usurped, of laws violated and civil slaughter instituted?

I have no desire to keep alive old animosities or to recall the past with a view to let it rankle. I am willing that the lessons of the war should be their own monitor to those who learned them. But when I hear those who risked their lives to save our country charged with betraying our country; when I hear those whose shorn limbs and maimed trunks are witnesses of their devotion to the laws charged with breaking the laws; when I hear those who are now lying in their premature graves for the cause of the Constitution charged with usurping that Constitution, I cannot help it if my indignant heart beats fast and my utterance grows thick, while I demand to know "Who are ye that denounce us?"

It is for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that I say the present issue is one which concerns our young men greatly, because it contains the question whether in any future war it is worth while for our young men to embark in it. Heretofore it has always been held in all ages, ancient and modern, that he who defended his country was entitled to the gratitude of his country. But if it shall be decided by this election that he who defends his country is to be aspersed by his country, then the sooner it is understood the better it will be for those who would have otherwise periled their existence at the call of their people! That issue is involved in this campaign, and no artifice or chicanery should be permitted to bury it out of sight. But what right have those to complain who were in the Democratic convention but yet were not in the rebel ranks? Did they aid us to suppress the rebellion? Were they prompt with men and money in our need? Were they hopeful in our dark days and joyful in our bright days? Did they cheer our soldiers and give them the strength of their blessings and a God speed? Did they nurse them when sick and succor them when wounded? No, sir; they did not, or else they would not be found to-day in such company. The civilian who supported the military in the day of the war has never yet complained that we have done great wrong, or never yet desired to take the reins of government from the Republican party.

This is no schism in our own ranks. This is no falling off of those who once were with us because of our misdeeds. This is no branch of the Union party saying that we are tyrants and usurpers and robbers and destroyers, and that therefore they can support us no longer. Not at all. It is simply our old enemies who have fought us in the Halls of Congress and on the battle-field and in campaigns for years, never winning, ever failing, but always fierce and hateful. It affords me sincere pleasure that I may look again upon those who met so lately in convention at the city of Chicago. What a sight was there. Mr. Chairman, there were gathered together the men who had served their country in every capacity to which duty called them. The men whose devotion had been as unswerving as their fidelity was unquestioned. Men whose sole thoughts and whose constant thoughts were for their country's good, and how best and soonest to make it manifest and permanent. Men from the closet, men from the camp, men from the public station, men from private life, men of destination, men unknown; but men, all of them, whithersoever they came and whatsoever they were, all of them men who came on the one thought of how yet to aid their country.

Whom did they select, and how were they selected? Not after days of balloting and nights of intrigue; not upon bargains by politicians and tradings by tricksters; not upon appliances of questionable morality and through stimulants of debasing tendency. In a moment, as it were, and by one spontaneous accord, the hearts of all of these men came together, and their judgments approved their instincts. With one unflinching acclaim they selected the hero whose valor had been resplendent in the field, and the statesman whose wisdom had been acknowledged in Congress. The popular judgment is seldom wrong, but never was it so right as when it asked that this Government should be put in the hands of Grant and Colfax. They had seen Grant clothed with the powers of a dictator, and seen him use them with the moderation of a patriot. They had seen him at the head of an irresistible Army, and seen him disband it as from a dress-parade. They had watched him achieve victory after victory, and yet quietly put off all the shows and trappings of war. They had found him sagacious as a counselor and safe as a chieftain. He had proved himself to be honest, and they knew he could be trusted.

Sir, on that day three hundred thousand sainted martyrs to the cause of liberty, for whom the earth had bared her bosom to receive their manly forms, and heaven opened wide her gates to receive their noble spirits, looked down approvingly upon our action, because it was the action of true and faithful men, intending the honor, prosperity, and happiness of their country. I have no doubt, sir, of their election. To doubt it would be to impugn the judgment of my countrymen. The country demands that the political power for that "many years to come" desired by the Democrats shall be intrusted to the Republican party. They have faith in the Republican party. They judge it by what it has done, and hence they know full well what it will do. They know that the Republican party is in fact the only party of peace and prosperity. It was that party which led the hosts of the Union to the haven of peace through the red ordeal of war. These questions which now embarrass us are but the debris of war. We have cared for the wounded, we have buried the dead. We have disbanded our armies as part of the work remaining after the war. To give stability to the currency, to equalize taxation, to harmonize States, and to insure prosperity, is still another and probably quite as difficult a portion of that same labor. But the party which did the one is unquestionably equal to the other.

I am not an enthusiast when obstacles are to be overcome and when intricate questions are to be solved. I do not wish, therefore, to be called visionary or enthusiastic when I predict the results which will certainly follow from the administration of the Republican party in four years more. We will see, sir, then the admirable results of having all the different Departments of the Government acting in entire unison and accord. Heretofore during the eight years that our party has been in power, we have had to give four of them to stay the tide of rebellion, and the rest have been rendered nearly useless to us by the obstinacy, the perversion, and the machinations of a designing Executive. When we marched into the field our foe was before us. We knew what we had to meet. There were no surprises in store for us. It was the dread arbitrament of battle. But after that we had another foe to meet, a dangerous foe, powerful and insidious; one whose assaults were made in the garb of peace and under the pretenses of law; one who sought to check every step of our progress and retard every advance of our civilization. Our time has been occupied in detecting the hidden ambushes of this enemy, and saving ourselves from his surprises. But soon he will pass away.

Like the armed foe whose accessory he was he will disappear from the public gaze and become impotent for further harm. With the Executive to encourage the Congress, and with a Congress which will respect and hearken to the Executive; then, indeed, the fruits of our legislation will be visible and gratifying. Commerce will revive, for the country will have stability. Our ships shall once again multiply upon the seas, for our flag will denote security. Our name shall be respected abroad, for we shall have demonstrated the doctrine of self-government. Our bonds will be sought for investment, for we shall have vindicated our integrity. Our currency shall be unsuspected at home, for we shall have proved its value. Our revenue shall be increased, for the country will have become inspired with confidence. Bad men will be hurled from power, and honest ones put in their places. Our taxes shall be diminished, for all will unite in yielding them. The southern States will be reorganized and recognized, for they will have seen that therein lays their welfare.

We will go on, sir, as a nation hand in hand, treading the broad pathway which leads us up to prosperity and progress, with our march unimpeded by the difficulties which now surround us, and posterity shall bless our work unceasingly forever.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Mr. Chairman, in what I shall have to say on this occasion I shall endeavor to discuss briefly the political situation as presented to the country by the two great political parties who have joined issue before the people upon the questions which have divided them and now divide them. I shall not be able to refer to but few of these questions in the time allotted me, and shall take up only one or two vital points which seem to be the great issues that divide and disturb the country, and upon which so much discussion has already been had. Reconstruction is the one great question out of which most of our divisions have arisen, and around which have revolved the severest controversies that have grown out of the results and close of the war. Taxation, corruption in the management of public affairs, and finance are matters of great moment, and will have their full share of attention before the people in the fierce struggle upon which we are entering, and I doubt not be well understood by them; but as the peace of the country and the safety of the nation is more directly involved in the restoration of the States lately in rebellion and the success of the wise and generous policy adopted by Congress to accomplish such restoration, and which is already nearly complete, I shall confine myself to this policy, and endeavor to show its legality and the pressing necessity of its maintenance.

The peace of the country is being restored as our work of reconstruction proceeds, and if it be checked or upturned anarchy and disorder must and will follow. The Democratic party have joined issue with us especially upon this great question. It has opposed it from the first here and elsewhere, and now, with the view of appealing to the people, it has declared in national convention that all of it is unconstitutional and void, and must be overthrown. This being such a vital issue, I desire to call the attention of the country to it, its nature and character, how it is justified, and why it should be upheld and sustained by the people. I cannot dwell upon its details, and it is not necessary, for they are known to all. The nature of the work, and under what jurisdiction it rightfully belonged, and the necessities that entered into and still belong to it, will more especially engage my attention. As all this work is to pass in review before the people for their approval or disapproval it should be clearly understood by them.

While the questions submitted are so vital, and the results to follow the final decision so important and lasting—while the peace of the Republic depends upon the verdict which the people are to give—it is a consolation that lifts the heart above all despondency and doubt to know that our Government will be what the people make it, that it belongs to them and those who come after them, and who will bear their names and inherit their purposes and hopes; that in every trial in the past, however severe, they have arisen above passion, prejudice, and party even, and by patriotic devotion to country and sacrifices never before known or witnessed in the world's history have crushed the most causeless, wicked, and powerful rebellion that ever cursed our race, and planted the Government, by their devotion, courage, and virtue, upon the immutable and imperishable foundations of equal and exact justice to all men.

The great Union party of the country and as now represented in Congress stand with firmness upon the policy of loyal reconstruction which we have inaugurated and nearly completed, and with faith in the people and confidence in their patriotism, believing that they want peace and not war, a restoration upon right principles which will stand and not have within it the seeds of treason and rebellion, and that will secure all the just fruits of the great conflict we have waged for the nation's life. It is, in a word, whether what has been accomplished since the war in the interests of loyalty and loyal reconstruction shall be maintained, or whether it shall be overthrown, and the governments set up by authority of law and under the provision of the Constitution which requires that republican governments shall be guaranteed to every State by the United States, and which can only be done by virtue of and under the authority of law, shall be overturned. These governments are now in the hands of and under the control of loyal men, and men who by their faithful adherence to our policy and earnest cooperation with us in this work of restoration have entitled themselves to and have received the exercise of the power which Congress reserves to itself of relieving all such from the disabilities which the war left upon them.

RECONSTRUCTION.

We enter the field at the close of the war, leaving the great conflict and its result an accomplished fact. No one can deny that the people of the rebel States became completely involved in the rebellion, that the governments of those States were in the interests of treason and the war against the Government, raised men, collected munitions of war, and prosecuted that war against it for four years and more with a will and determination never before equaled by any people, to overthrow and destroy our institutions and Government. Those States defied our power, resorted to every means of war, human and inhuman, to accomplish their purpose, and I take it that it can never be questioned by any one or any party or court, with any degree of self-respect or honesty, that when the war closed there were no loyal governments or organizations in any of those States known to the Constitution of the United States, or through which the Government of the United States could cooperate.

Those that existed before the war were swept away, or had taken upon themselves all the character of treason and rebellion, giving allegiance to another government formed and established for the very purpose of destroying the Government of the United States. No one has yet been able to show that those rebel States were in accord with us, or could have any claim upon us for recognition. Neither the close of the war, the collapse of the rebellion, nor the laying down of their arms by those engaged in it makes any difference in the status of those States or their people as connected with the Government of the United States, any more than would the voluntary surrender of himself of a murderer who had willfully committed the act relieve himself of the penalty of the law he had violated by such a surrender. The Constitution proclaims that levying war against the Government or giving aid and comfort to its enemies is treason, the highest crime known to our laws. This treason or crime is against the great loyal people of the country, the power they represent, the sovereignty of the nation, and those who have defied it and committed all these acts of rebellion and war cannot voluntary and of their own motion and when it suits their pleasure, upon ceasing open hostilities, lay aside for themselves all their disabilities, wash out all the stains their enormous crimes have covered themselves with, and take again upon themselves their former purity and virtue, and assume at their pleasure the power and place they threw aside to engage in the unholy war by which they are so disabled.

They have violated law, the supreme law, and can only be relieved by and through the authority of law. The people, whose authority they have defied and whose laws they have trampled under their feet, through their representatives, are alone able to reestablish those States and clothe them with loyalty and put them in a position to be again restored to a full and equal participation in the Government with the other and loyal States. Any other theory than this is a false and dangerous one. If adopted, and it becomes the settled theory of our people, our Government is but a myth, our Constitution but a rope of sand, with no inherent power or strength to save itself from overthrow and compel obedience to its Constitution and laws. Any other doctrine than this is in the interests completely of secession, and if adopted would reverse all the settlements of the war, change the decisions which have been given amid the fire and blood of a thousand battle-fields, and proclaimed at the termination of the great conflict over the graves of more than half a million of our people who fell in the controversy and whose death was the cost of the struggle. Is it not strange that any one who has a regard for his name and fame dare take issue with us on this question?

The Democratic party, in Congress and out of it, not only acts against our policy and obstructs our work in trying to reestablish and restore these States, but boldly proclaims the doctrine that the rebel States, without law in their behalf, without the action of the loyal people against whom they have offended and whose laws they have violated openly and willfully, can demand at the hands of the Government complete recognition, and can resume their former place in said Government and exercise their ancient power and control. If this can be done, then no crime has been committed by the States or people in rebellion; then secession is right and justifiable when it can secure success; then is our Government powerless and not entitled to the respect and obedience of the people, and cannot command, as it now does, the admiration of the world.

The President of the United States announced in his proclamation, issued directly after the war closed, when he began his work of reconstruction in North Carolina, the true doctrine in relation to the status of the rebellious States, and the Republican party has ever acted upon this doctrine, and upon it is based its work of reconstruction. In the preamble of that proclamation the President says:

"Whereas the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the United States a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion and domestic violence; and whereas the President of the United States is by the Constitution made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, as well as chief civil executive officer of the United States, and is bound by solemn oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States, and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and whereas the rebellion which has been waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has, in its revolutionary progress, deprived the people of the State of North Carolina of all civil government; and whereas it becomes necessary and proper to carry out and enforce the obligations of the people of the United States to the people of North Carolina in securing them in the enjoyment of a republican form of government."

Here he admits that the war, by its revolutionary progress, had deprived North Carolina of all civil government; and, of course, all the other States in rebellion occupied the same position; in fact, the same proclamation was used in relation to all the other States in question. This is the true theory and the only one that can stand any test whatever. He also says what is true, that the Constitution declares that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government. It became at once the duty of somebody or some power to execute this guarantee. No republican government existed in ten States lately in rebellion; in fact no civil government existed at all in them. Nothing but the wrecks of rebel organizations and a treasonable confederacy lie scattered all over those once beautiful States when in accord and harmony with the Constitution and Government. They were States not out of the Union, but States in the Union with loyal civil governments overthrown and destroyed, lying in their prostration helpless and unable to restore to themselves their former position. They were States in the Union with rights that pertain to loyalty, forfeited by their acts of war, and hence of treason, and as unable to relieve themselves of the disabilities they had incurred by such acts, or to take upon themselves full powers and rights as before possessed, as a Territory would be to take upon itself the full powers of a State in the Union without the action and consent of the Government as provided by the Constitution and the laws.

Upon this doctrine the President and Congress both stood at the close of the war, and while he has departed from it the party holding the power here has carefully and faithfully adhered to it.

In the meaning of the Constitution who is the United States? Certainly not the President, not Congress, and neither is the Supreme Court. All together constitute the United States, and back and above all are the people, who make and unmake all these branches of Government at their will, and change their Constitution and laws at their pleasure in the way and manner prescribed. The war being over, the first duty was upon the President in the absence of the people or their Representatives. It was his duty to govern these States and protect the people thereof with the means provided by the Constitution until the people of the United States could be heard in their own behalf, and by and through the authority of their laws begin the work of reconstruction, and initiate the execution of the guarantees of the Constitution. The President can only act in pursuance of law, and the Constitution makes him the officer to execute the laws when made, giving him no voice in the making of them, only to approve or disapprove them as he may deem to be his duty, whose disapproval even proves of no effect when overruled by the Congress according to the Constitution.

The court cannot make a law, and can have no part in the work of restoring these revolted States, only as it is called upon to decide cases that arise under the operation of the laws already made by the people's constituted authority as I have stated. How clear, then, it is that the first step in the work of restoring these States to full relationship with the Government, and, in fact, the greater part of this work, is for Congress to do, as representing the people, the source of all power and who are eventually to decide upon all the questions involved. This work of reconstruction is purely a political one, and belongs more exclusively to Congress than to any other branch of the Government. It cannot in the very nature of the case be an executive work or a judicial one. The President cannot without law or authority from Congress restore to or build up a State government in a State where all civil government has been overthrown by war, as he says was the case in these rebellious States, any more than he can build up a State government in a Territory and demand that it be recognized by the Congress as a legitimate and legal State government. And still he proceeded to build up governments in those States, beginning with the State of North Carolina, without any law or authority from Congress, and with no power in the Constitution whatever to sanction such a course.

The eighteenth clause of section eight of the first article of the Constitution of the United States declares that—

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department or officer thereof."

The power and duty of the guarantee to which I have referred is in the Constitution, and in this clause it is declared that the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution this guarantee, as well as other duties and powers vested in the Government of the United States, shall be and reside with Congress and nowhere else. After declaring it to be the duty of the United States to guaranty to every State a republican form of government, the Constitution says that Congress shall see to it in so many words that laws are made to carry out this obligation imposed upon the United States. It is for Congress to say what laws are necessary and proper to execute this guarantee and for no one else, only as the President takes his share in the work of making such laws as Congress may think proper, which agency we do not deny, but recognize. That this whole subject belongs to Congress more especially than to any other branch of the Government the Supreme Court also has decided. In the celebrated Rhode Island case so often referred to, of Luther against Borden, the court speaks as follows:

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on the application of the Legislature (or the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for, as the United States guaranties to each State a republican form of government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every department of the Government, and not to be questioned in a judicial tribunal. The right to decide is placed there and not in the courts."

"No one, we believe, has ever doubted the proposition that, according to the institutions of this country, the sovereignty in every State resides in the people of the State; and that they may alter or change their form of government at their own pleasure. But whether they have changed it or not by abolishing an old government and establishing a new one in its place, is a question to be settled by the political power, and when that power has decided the courts are bound to take notice of that decision and to follow it."

I quote this decision of the Supreme Court here merely to show what the position of the court is on the question before us, to wit: that it belongs to Congress to decide upon the status of a State, not only to decide upon the qualifications of its representatives to this body, but to decide whether there is a State organization legally entitled to any representation at all, clearly giving, as we have before claimed, under the Constitution to Congress the control of this whole question. The court says correctly that all such questions are political in their nature, and are to be settled by the political power of the Government under the forms prescribed by the Constitution. This decision was given in connection with two conflicting governments in Rhode Island; but if this be purely political and a work for legislation wholly, how much more is it a work of legislation and congressional action to restore governments to States where they have been overthrown, and thus execute the guarantees of the Constitution. Whatever may have been the ultimate purpose of the President and his Cabinet, it is evident that it was at first intended that all his work should be temporary and subject to the action of Congress entirely and completely. This was declared by Secretary Seward in several of his dispatches to those engaged in the work of restoring governments under the policy of the President. I quote his dispatch to Mr. Marvin, provisional governor of Florida, as an example. After giving him some instructions as to his duty, he says in conclusion:

"It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress."

As the Democratic party came to the more full control of the President and his administration, this policy was departed from, and the restoration of the rebel States under the policy of the President, which had given the power into the hands of those who had lately united to overthrow and destroy the Government, and who did secure the destruction of their own State organizations, came to be the Democratic policy, as it is now the Democratic policy, as opposed to the policy of loyal reconstruction which Congress has adopted and nearly completed, and which is now attempted to be entirely overthrown.

NEGRO SUFFRAGE.

In proceeding with this work of reconstruction, it has been found to be an absolute political necessity to give the ballot into the hand of the colored man, in order to secure loyal governments in the South. To place the power in those governments in the hands of the late leading rebels was found to be an unsafe policy, so far as the interests of the Government were concerned, and absolutely destructive of the rights and hopes of the loyal men in those States, both white and black. The leading rebels were those who had been the most active and influential characters before the war, and cooperation with them on the part of the loyal whites even could only be had by submitting to their dictation and by a complete abandonment of all loyal and patriotic purposes and efforts on their part. For the Government to have allowed this, after all the trials of the war and their steadfast devotion to the old flag, would have been a crime deserving the severest retribution, and altogether unworthy the courage and devotion which had sustained it and overthrew the rebellion. No less ungrateful and criminal would it have been to have abandoned the colored race to the cruel resentments and oppressions which must have followed and which everywhere existed in the South where the power of the Government was not felt, and the loyal element was not in the ascendancy.

The Democratic party, true to its constant opposition to our form of reconstruction upon a loyal basis, and that alone, has contested this question of suffrage in the South with us at every point, and now again in its platform recently made at New York it declares against it and would overthrow it if it attains to power. It cannot, however, destroy the right to vote of the negro in the late revolted States any more than it can any other feature of the reconstruction we have adopted; for if we are within the grant of power under the Constitution in part we are in whole, and if part of this work is to stand all of it will stand. It is a work of legislation, and belongs exclusively, as we have shown, to the political power of the Government—the legislation necessary and proper to fulfill all the guarantees of the Constitution, to be determined and judged of by Congress alone, subject to the action of the President as provided by the Constitution. The following is the second resolution of the Republican platform recently adopted at Chicago upon this subject:

"The guarantee of Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

The Democratic party complain that we compel negro suffrage South and ignore it at the North. I deny it. Democracy opposes negro suffrage at the North as at the South, while if left to the votes of the Republican party North, in every northern State, I doubt not, suffrage would be universal, or at least without distinction as to race or color. We, however, leave each State North to settle that question for itself, as it has a right to, as each State South controlled its own domestic affairs while loyal and as they would to-day had they never rebelled against the Government and thus lost by their crimes and treason the right to such self-control and sovereignty. The loss of this control, of these rights, is the forfeiture they have made by going into rebellion against their Government, and we are now earnestly at work against the protest and constant opposition of the Democracy in restoring them to full relationship with the Government and returning to them, as soon as may be, as many of the rights they have heretofore possessed which are consonant with the new relations they hold toward us, and safe to the Government to confer upon them. The colored man South has always been our friend, and even in the darkest days of our trial never deserted us.

The Government had never shown any sympathy for him, but had stood by and seen him and his race subjected to a most cruel bondage for many long years, still when our trial came he was our steadfast friend; and on the march, in prison, on the picket line, everywhere and at all times, hazarded everything for our cause and the safety of the nation's defenders. Side by side in the storm of battle he met the fierce charge of treason, and side by side went down to death with freedom's defenders, and with them lies in one common grave.

The Democratic party during all this controversy would have favored negro suffrage had there been any good reason to suppose that it would have resulted in strength to their cause and they could have controlled the colored vote, while Congress, representing the great loyal party charged with the works of reconstruction, has acted upon the question as involving justice and right, beside being a necessity which it was impossible to ignore or throw aside. Whatever might be the political character of that vote in the South in the end, we have acted upon a sense of duty, and leave the results to the future. In the hand of a freeman the ballot is a power. It shapes policies, makes rulers, overthrows systems, and compels protection. By it the weak are made strong, the power of the oppressor is broken down, and equal and exact justice is meted out to all in laws bearing alike upon all which they are to affect and whose obedience they demand.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Another important and vital consideration connected with our plan of reconstruction which the people are asked to overturn is the proposed constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article. This article has been adopted by nearly all of the loyal States, and is now being ratified by the Legislatures of the States South as fast as they comply with the laws of Congress and their governments are restored. It will very soon be a part of the supreme law of the land in spite of the united opposition of Democratic rebels South and the Democracy North, both of whom from the first have acted in unison to defeat it. The following is the amendment now pending as part of our reconstruction policy, no State lately in rebellion being allowed recognition unless it adopts it, and thus each aiding to make it part of the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss of emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

It would seem that no one could object to such a salutary measure as this, in or out of Congress, rebel or loyal. And yet not a Democrat in either House of Congress voted for it, but, on the contrary, all present and voting voted and labored against it. This, too, must share the same fate as is meted out by the Democracy in its recent platform to all loyal reconstruction, and be overthrown and wiped out if they come into power. The first section of this amendment declares a self-evident truth, or what ought to be so considered by our people, that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside;" and hence that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of such citizens, "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Who cannot see that this is to enforce the determinations of the war? The equal rights of all men without crime, which was one of the things settled by the long and fiery ordeal of war, is here guaranteed and settled forever.

Again, the second section is none the less important and necessary. Heretofore the South had political power in the Government in part upon the basis of slave representation, while to that class of persons no voice whatever was given in the Government of the United States or the State governments. This was an aristocracy which built up a ruling class to trample upon labor and its representatives, which was overthrown by the war brought on and waged by itself and for the perpetuation of its power. This section provides against any such aristocracy or injustice in the future, and that the political power of any State shall be reduced in the same proportion that it is denied to any class of its male citizens twenty-one years of age. This, too, is to secure equal rights to the people and protect them against injustice and the aggressions of power.

The third section simply provides that those who have been prominent in the rebellion, and responsible for it, shall not hereafter hold any place of honor or trust in the Government of the United States unless relieved from the disabilities thus incurred by a two-thirds vote of Congress.

The fourth section is still more important if possible, and of greater interest to the taxpayer and soldier than the others. The debt incurred by law in crushing out the rebellion shall be held sacred, and that greater debt we owe to the soldiers, widows, and orphans, made so by the war, by way of pensions and bounties, shall never be questioned. And what is more important still, if possible, all the debts incurred by the rebellion, in aid of it and for its interests, whether in the loss of slaves, obligations touching pensions or bounties, shall never, in any part of them, be assumed by any State or the Government of the United States. It would seem that the propriety of this amendment could not be questioned by any voter in the land, and yet it has been constantly assailed by this Democratic party which is now in the field against us, and which has declared here upon this floor and in convention recently assembled that all this work shall be overthrown if it comes into power.

I desire to call the attention of the loyal people of the country to the startling and lamentable fact that this party is making its word good as fast as it gets its opportunity. See how they make haste in the State of Ohio to repeal the action of its Legislature adopting this amendment as soon as they obtain control. The people of Ohio are largely in favor of the adoption of this amendment, and its Legislature, acting in accordance with the sentiment of the State a year ago, adopted it. By accident the Democratic party recently coming into power, true to their ancient devotion to the slaveocracy of the South, forgetful of the war and its results, blind to its teachings and irreversible decisions, repealed the action of the former Legislature, and disgraced itself and the country by sending to this body certified copies of such action.

Now Jersey, during the last winter, has done the same thing and helped to make this record for the Democracy. Tell me that this party has claims upon the soldier for his vote, when it refuses to sustain this amendment which is calculated to take care of him and protect his rights and all that he holds dear in life, by providing against any possible repudiation of his claims upon the Government, and the adoption of any obligations of the rebellion. How can the tax-payer support this Democratic party when it refuses in this manner to say, once for all, that no debts or obligations incurred in the interest of rebellion shall ever be assumed or paid by the Government of the United States? It is idle to answer to all this that there is no danger of such a result ever taking place if this amendment is not adopted; for these States when equal sovereign States, and again restored to their places in the Union, may, by law or by amendments to their State constitutions, do all these things in an hour of revenge or madness unless prohibited by the Constitution of the United States.

When we look over the history of this party for the last ten years and see how it has labored in the interest of the men who have for years been plotting the overthrow of the Government, who encouraged them to proceed in their bloody and wicked work by letter and by word, who in the person of many of its leaders encouraged the rebellion, giving it aid and comfort during the long and dark night of the war we waged to save the nation's life, a party who met in national convention in 1864, in the very presence of victory, and declared the war a failure, and demanded that it be closed up, which would have been but a base surrender to treason and rebellion, and who went then before the people upon this demand for indorsement; a party who, by such constant efforts in the wrong direction and in the interests of the rebellion, gave to the rebellion much of its power and hope; a party which again, after all the mistakes it has made and the evil it has done, meets as it has recently in convention, striking hands with and paying special honors to the leading spirits of the rebellion, who have opposed the work of legal reconstruction in their States, and who are to-day unchanged in their hatred to the Government and those who have saved it, as well as those who are now trying to restore it—when we examine all this record in the light of the past and the present, we wonder that they dare go before the people with such a record; and we should have but little faith in the patriotism and virtue of the people if they should be tolerated for a moment.

But in addition to all this it is now proposed to overthrow all the good work that has been done, including this constitutional amendment, which if adopted will forever shut the door against oppression, injustice, inequality, taxation for rebel indebtedness and attending obligations. These issues are so plain they need not be mistaken by any one; and I desire to call the attention of the country to them that they may not be overlooked. Dark, indeed, will be the day when the people of the country abandon all guarantee for safety and security against future rebellion and war. Dark, indeed, will be the day when they turn over again into the hands of the Democratic party the administration of the Government, and thus bring into control again the very men who inaugurated and waged a cruel war for nearly five years to destroy it.

It cannot be. Should such a result come to pass all the prophecies and sayings of the leading spirits of secession and rebellion made before the war and during it would be made good, which were, that the people as a whole were not capable of self-government; that the power ought to rest with the few, a favored class; that capital should own labor, and that the more intelligent and wealthy should rule and all others obey. The war has swept away all such aristocratic notions, and now we are asked to turn back the great tide of progress and civilization and negative the results of the war. This will not be done save by war and revolution. Nearly three quarters of a million of native-born loyal colored citizens have been invested with the right of suffrage by law, their bondage having been swept away and their rights established by war and as one of its results; and we are told that this shall all be upturned and come to naught. These are rights which can never be taken away except by crime, and the world's history does not show an instance where so large a number of free people were ever degraded by being stripped of them after having enjoyed their benefits. It can only be done by revolution and war, and this is the entertainment which the Democratic party holds out to the people of this country in the event of success in the coming struggle.

Under our work nearly all of the southern States are restored to their places and rights in the Union, and their Representatives, in the persons of loyal men, are taking their seats in both branches of Congress. The wounds caused by the war are fast being healed up as State after State assumes the functions with which it has been invested by law in accordance with the Constitution and the will of the people, and peace and order are everywhere beginning to reign. And yet the Democratic party, in convention, tells us that this work is void and must fall. The country wants peace, but the Democracy invites it to strife and confusion. Never were graver or more important issues presented to a free people to settle than now, but they must be met and determined. A distinguished Democratic Senator, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] in discussing the political situation a day or two since, presented this issue as follows:

"I repeat that, in my judgment, for the purpose of obtaining validity to reconstruction, safety to reconstruction, continuance to it, effect for it as it has been undertaken by Congress, it is necessary that a majority of the people in the adhering States shall indorse it in the elections of 1868."

"It must be baptized with popular approval; it must get the judgment of the people, and from those whose right to vote in this Union and to control its political destinies is unquestioned. If when you carry your body of laws passed since 1863 to the people of the North and of the West and of the great central States, they say 'Well done, good and faithful servants; you have performed our will and executed our wishes, and your work shall stand,' then, and then only, will you command the situation; then, and then only, will you be entitled to ask of me and of others acquiescence in what you have done. I acknowledge a sort of common law in this country upon constitutional questions. I acknowledge that when a debate has been sent to the people and deliberately determined by them, their decision cannot be reversed or disregarded. That is a sort of 'higher law' to which I subscribe."

"Take the issue of reconstruction as it stands, and submit it to the freemen of the adhering States. If they go with you, we must acquiesce in their judgment, and your policy may stand good for the future."

"You stand or fall before that tribunal which is competent to judge us both, and whose authority we cannot question here or elsewhere, now or hereafter. Your reconstruction may stand good to you."

"If you get a verdict from the freemen of the adhering States, and then only."

"To end and to sum up the argument, reconstruction requires the support of the people. If it get it, it can stand; if it do not get it, and do not get it in the adhering States, it will fall; and all the enactments that Congress can now heap up cannot alter or control that result."

I quote this language of the Senator to call the attention of the country to the great importance that attaches itself to the decision that it is to render upon the issues presented.

But, sir, as another plank in the Democratic platform, adopted at New York, which more fully shows the purposes and determination of that party in the event of success at the polls, I present the letter of General Blair, who was nominated by acclamation for the office of Vice President:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1868.

DEAR COLONEL: In reply to your inquiries I beg leave to say that I leave to you to determine, on consultation with my friends from Missouri, whether my name shall be presented to the Democratic convention, and to submit the following, as what I consider the real and only issue in this contest.

The reconstruction policy of the Radicals will be complete before the next election; the States so long excluded will have been admitted; negro suffrage established and the carpet-baggers installed in their seats in both branches of Congress. There is no possibility of changing the political character of the Senate, even if the Democrats should elect their President and a majority of the popular branch of Congress. We cannot, therefore, undo the Radical plan of reconstruction by congressional action; the Senate will continue a bar to its repeal. Must we submit to it? How can it be overthrown? It can only be overthrown by the authority of the Executive who is sworn to maintain the Constitution, and who will fail to do his duty if he allows the Constitution to perish under a series of congressional enactments which are in palpable violation of its fundamental principles.

If the President elected by the Democracy enforces or permits others to enforce these reconstruction acts, the Radicals by the accession of twenty spurious Senators and fifty Representatives will control both branches of Congress, and his administration will be as powerless as the present one of Mr. Johnson.

There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives. The House of Representatives will contain a majority of Democrats from the North, and they will admit the Representatives elected by the white people of the South, and with the cooperation of the President it will not be difficult to compel the Senate to submit once more to the obligations of the Constitution. It will not be able to withstand the public judgment, if distinctly invoked and clearly expressed on this fundamental issue, and it is the sure way to avoid all future strife to put the issue plainly to the country.

I repeat that this is the real and only question which we should allow to control us: shall we submit to the usurpations by which the Government has been overthrown, or shall we exert ourselves for its full and complete restoration? It is idle to talk of bonds, greenbacks, gold, the public faith, and the public credit. What can a Democratic President do in regard to any of these with a Congress in both branches controlled by the carpet-baggers and their allies? He will be powerless to stop the supplies by which the negroes are organized into political clubs, by which an army is maintained to protect these vagabonds in their outrages upon the ballot. These, and things like these, eat up the revenues and resources of the Government and destroy its credit—make the difference between gold and greenbacks. We must restore the Constitution before we can restore the finances, and to do this we must have a President who will execute the will of the people by trampling into dust the usurpation of Congress, known as the reconstruction acts. I wish to stand before the convention upon this issue, but it is one which embraces everything else that is of value in its large and comprehensive results. It is the one thing that includes all that is worth a contest, and without it there is nothing that gives dignity, honor, or value to the struggle.

Your friend,
FRANK P. BLAIR.

Colonel JAMES O. BROADHEAD.

Here is the key-note of the campaign, the rallying cry of the Democracy. Give us success, says General Blair, and we will stamp out all the work of Congress in restoring the revolted States to their places in the Union, turn out their representatives from their seats in both ends of this Capitol, and by the Army, if necessary to accomplish the work, we will call the leading spirits of the rebellion in those States to the positions of place and power, and hand over the governments and the loyal men in those States to their tender mercy and control. All questions of finances, "of greenbacks, public faith, and the public credit" are of no account whatever, says Mr. Blair, in comparison with the great question of "trampling in the dust the reconstruction acts of Congress by the President, with all the power he can control."

Mr. Chairman, no wonder Mr. Blair was nominated by acclamation by a convention composed so largely of those lately leaders in the rebellion to overthrow the Government. No wonder his nomination was applauded as no other act of the convention was, and that those leading rebels expressed themselves so delighted with it. It was, sir, an indorsement of their rebellion, a repudiation of all the decisions of the great conflict and victory waged and won by, and an insult to the loyal people of the country who achieved them. I desire to ask the people of the country from my place here, as one of their humble Representatives, if they have not already paid enough in the past for the supremacy of the Democratic party. It was that party in the South that rebelled against the Government and caused all the desolations of a long and bloody war for its maintenance. All the millions of dollars that we have appropriated and drawn from the people and are still drawing is but part of the penalty the country is paying for having so long allowed that party to shape its policy and control its destiny. The widowhood and orphanage that fills our land with sorrow and woe and bears heavily upon the great heart of the nation still, is but another part of this same penalty we are paying for Democratic supremacy.

The broad acres all over the land filled with our noble dead and the humble testimonials raised to their memory "are sacred and affecting evidence" of the penalty which we are now paying for intrusting the destinies of the country so long to this party.

The only safety lies in continuing the power in the hands of the Union party, which has carried the country safely through our great struggle, which is now fast reestablishing the Government upon an enduring basis of loyalty and peace, which still demands that we shall continue to hold in our hands all necessary security and guarantee against a recurrence of past evils and for permanent union and loyalty in the future.

In striking contrast with the Democratic policy and candidates, General Grant, the great captain of our age, who has during all the war and still carries high the banner of the Union, says, "Let us have peace." In his election the country will have peace. It will be a sure token of peace, an unfailing guarantee that quiet and order will soon reign, and that very soon a divided and distracted people will settle down upon the basis of law and equal justice to all which we have planted in the patriotism and unconditional loyalty of the people. No threats of revolution or violence can impede our progress or turn back the tide of our advancing civilization. Those who make them, or stop to doubt and cavil over the results of the "irrepressible conflict" that is so clearly developing the great duties of the hour will either be lost sight of in the distance behind or buried up out of sight beneath the wreck of old and discarded barbarisms and condemned theories and policies. The world is moving onward, lifting itself from the dust and filth that have so long hidden the latent and undeveloped virtues and powers of its peoples, and placing higher up the standard of a common humanity, and establishing forever the equal brotherhood of all men.

America takes the lead in this great work. Our example is shaking the very foundations of empires and thrones which rest heavily upon unwilling and oppressed peoples the world over, and under our influence greater rights and privileges are being wrenched from the grasp of wealth and power and bestowed upon those who have heretofore trembled under fear and subjection. This high privilege comes to us out of the very nature of our institutions worked out and developed to their legitimate end and destiny under the direction of a Power higher than any human agency by which they were conceived and which will secure their perfection.

It comes to us, it is true, through the storm and conflicts of war, through the fire and the blood of battles, after sacrifices greater than the world's history records, but still this destiny is ours to enjoy and perfect, and we should use it as not abusing it. I warn the people of the country to look well to the situation, and remember that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Not expecting long to hold a seat upon this floor, I can with perfect freedom enjoin upon all the people who are soon to decide the great issues pending to beware of false men who are not worthy of the confidence of a free people who have sacrificed so much for their country, and trust only those who will stand firmly by the great principles of justice and truth, and whose past fidelity gives ample guarantee for the untried future.

I cannot enlarge upon the ideas that open up to the mind as we enter this sublime field of contemplation. Give success to the doctrines and policy of the party that has saved the Republic, that is developing so rapidly its immense and varied resources, whose sublime principles of progress, justice, and national integrity and good will challenge the admiration of the world, and all the visions of the present will fall far short of the grand reality of the future. The great hero of all our wars, our standard bearer, embodies in his simple patriotism good sense and unquestioned honesty, all the elements that make him just now above all others the representative of the loyal and progressive sentiment of our times, and whose election will give the greatest security, permanency, and integrity to our cause and country. The national faith will be vindicated, its honor and patriotism maintained, and the high road to peace and prosperity be opened and unobstructed.

Mr. LOUGHBRIDGE addressed the committee in remarks which will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. COBB moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CULLOM reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, (at ten o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CHANLER: The petition of officers of the Army, for the passage of a bill to equalize the pay of officers and to establish the pay of enlisted soldiers in the Army.

By Mr. SCHENCK: Three petitions of officers of the Army, asking for the passage of General Schenck's bill to fix and equalize the pay of officers, and to establish the pay of enlisted soldiers of the Army.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 17, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, information in relation to the number of persons employed in the navy-yards on the 1st day of January, 1868, and the 1st day of July, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to contractors for supplies furnished to friendly Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SENATORS FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WILSON presented the credentials of Joseph C. Abbott, elected a Senator in Congress by the Legislature of North Carolina, chosen under the reconstruction acts, for the term expiring on the 4th day of March, 1871; which were read.

Mr. SUMNER presented the credentials of John Pool, elected a Senator in Congress by the Legislature of North Carolina, chosen under the reconstruction acts, for the term expiring on the 4th day of March, 1873; which were read.

Mr. POMEROY. I trust that the Senators-elect will be sworn in and admitted to their seats.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the oath be administered to these Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT and Mr. POOL then advanced to the desk, escorted by Mr. WILSON and Mr. SUMNER; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.

COURTS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. WELCH. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 604. It is very brief, and it will take but a moment to consider it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 604) regulating the times and places of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida. It provides that the times and places of holding the United States district and circuit courts for the northern district of Florida shall hereafter be as follows: at Jacksonville on the first Monday of December, at Tallahassee on the first Monday of February, and at Pensacola on the first Monday of January, and that the terms of the United States courts heretofore held at St. Augustine and at Apalachicola be hereafter discontinued.

Mr. WELCH. I move to amend the bill in line seven, by striking out "January" and inserting "March," so that it will read: "and at Pensacola on the first Monday of March."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has that bill been referred to any committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEMPORARY LOAN CERTIFICATES.

Mr. CATTELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 548, to provide for the further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to entertain the motion. The Chair hears no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CATTELL. I am now willing to yield to morning business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the memorial of General B. S. Roberts, of the Army, addressed to the Senate, in which he sets forth that very great and gross injustice has been done to him in a letter addressed to the General-in-Chief of the Army and transmitted to the Senate, from W. B. Franklin, late major general of volunteers in the United States Army, in which General Franklin accuses General Roberts of not having a good character for truth, and refers as evidence of that to General George H. Thomas. General Roberts incloses in his memorial demanding justice a letter from General Thomas entirely repudiating any authority of his for the statement of General Franklin. As this has been sent to the Senate for some action connected with military affairs, General Roberts appeals to this body to give him an opportunity to vindicate his character. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying that pensions be granted to the surviving soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and to the widows of such as may have died; which was ordered to lie on the table, the subject having been reported upon.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for the adoption of measures for the reduction of the taxes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for a special tax of fifty cents per thousand on shingles imported from Canada in addition to the present ad valorem tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a personal explanation, or a statement in the nature of a personal explanation. There was laid on the tables of Senators yesterday, as I am told, a paper containing two extracts from the New York Herald of recent date. As the person who took the pains to print this paper did not send me a copy I am indebted to a Senator for one. There are two or three observations in this paper that I cannot allow to pass unnoticed, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to them. This is the first time I ever deemed it necessary to refer to a newspaper article in the Senate of the United States in the nature of a personal explanation. One of these articles is headed "Sherman's Funding Bill and the Treasury Ring." It says:

"It is a monstrous job, by which a few individuals are to make millions of dollars for manipulating the Government securities, for doing what the Government clerks would do just as well at only the cost of their regular salaries."

My reply to that is that nothing is to be done under the bill except what is done by Government clerks, as they are called.

"Then the bill gives enormous power to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds in such form and denomination as he may choose for the redemption, purchase, or exchange of the non-interest-bearing debt—that is, of the legal tenders—besides other powers, altogether out of character, and dangerous."

On the contrary, the bill gives to the Secretary of the Treasury no power whatever except what he possesses now, and every provision in it is a restraint upon the powers of the Secretary.

The writer further says:

"The only thing Congress should do with regard to financial matters is to tie up the hands of the Secretary in the matter of giving commissions for manipulating and exchanging securities and selling gold."

I am bound to say, in behalf of Congress, that Congress has done that twice in two bills; first by an amendment to an appropriation bill, and also by a section in this very funding bill of which the writer complains.

Then in the other article the writer says:

"The general desire of the people to lessen their burdens of taxation by reducing, if it can be done honestly, the interest on their public debt is taken advantage of by the Treasury ring to aid in getting through that gigantic job known as the Sherman funding scheme."

So far as the "Treasury ring" is concerned I do not know that anybody from the Treasury, directly or indirectly, applied for the passage of the bill. The Committee on Finance acted upon it from considerations of public policy and upon matters referred to them.

Again, the writer says:

"Though twice defeated"—

That is false, for no vote had ever been taken on the bill, and almost every amendment has been rejected—

"this precious job has altogether too much money in it to be readily given up, and its industrious author may be expected to spring it upon the Senate when there are but a dozen or so present, and get it through without calling the yeas and nays."

The Senate knows perfectly well that early in the session I introduced the bill, supported by a report, and have never called it up except after full notice. It has been considered after the most mature consideration. But all this I would not have noticed, because it is mere general newspaper declamation, a very common way by which some people try to defeat an important measure before Congress, and but for the fact that there is a reference here to my motives in connection with Jay Cooke & Co., who, it is said, have made large sums of money, I would not have troubled the Senate with the subject. The writer goes on to say:

"Mr. SHERMAN's zeal for a funding bill is stimulated by a desire to give his friends a job rather than a wish to relieve the people from any portion of their burden of taxation."

Now, Mr. President, I feel bound to say that Jay Cooke never, so far as I now recall, alluded to this bill in connection with or in writing to me. On the contrary, my impression is—and this opinion is supported by the knowledge of other Senators—that he, like most other bankers and brokers of the country, are opposed to the bill. They are perfectly willing to stand upon existing laws. This bill tends to destroy their vocation which feeds upon the large interest paid by the United States. Jay Cooke has recently written a pamphlet, in which he expresses his views on the subject of finance and dissents strongly from my own. He does not influence my action in the least. His name is thrown in to excite an unfounded prejudice. His firm have been employed by three successive Secretaries of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, Mr. FESSENDEN, and Mr. McCulloch, to perform certain important transactions in regard to the negotiation of bonds. Whenever the conduct of those Secretaries in that particular has been assailed in the Senate, I have always defended them on the ground that the arrangement was for the public interest. I have not a doubt of this, but so far as I know I have never done anything to promote the interests, directly or indirectly, of Jay Cooke & Co. I cannot now recall in the course of legislation during their employment that I have ever done anything to promote their interests. All that can be said of me in regard to Jay Cooke & Co. is that they are my personal friends, of the highest character and honor, who conduct a great business upon the highest principles of commercial and banking credit; and if they have made a fortune they have made it by honorable means, not so much by Government employment as by the great reputation they gained by their wonderful success in negotiating popular loans as agents of the Government. I repeat, they are not responsible for this funding bill, and I have no doubt, like the great mass of bankers and brokers, are opposed to it. But here in this paper is a direct imputation that the whole funding bill, as it is called, is a mere scheme to give Jay Cooke & Co. a job; when by the terms of the bill nobody can have a job under it. All the operations of the bill must be done with the voluntary action of the bondholders in exchanging their bonds for other securities par for par, and there can be no possibility of a job or employment or profit for private persons under it. It is unfortunately a very common mode of assailing a measure to attribute personal motives as supporting it. This measure can have no support except from the common interest of all persons to relieve the burden of the public debt and to restore our currency to the solid standard of gold and silver. And it must encounter all the natural opposition of great masses of people who make their profit from high interest and an inflated currency.

I feel it due to the Senate and myself that I should call attention to this matter, as I do not wish myself nor that the Senate should labor under an imputation of this kind where each of us know there is no ground for it. It is but just to Jay Cooke & Co., as well as to each Senator who voted for this bill, that I should make this statement. Sir, let me say to the people whom the Herald represents, and who got up this tract, that no efforts of theirs, no imputations of theirs, shall prevent me from pursuing the even tenor of my way, which leads me to compel, if I can, by honorable and fair means, a reduction of the burden of the public debt, and to lighten the load that now rests upon the people. Neither the Senate nor the Committee on Finance nor myself will support any proposition that impairs the public faith or sacrifices the public interest to "private jobs" or "Treasury rings;" nor, I trust, will we be deterred from promoting the common good of our constituents by any fear of calumny or slander.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, the bill (S. No. 622) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river was recommended to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill (S. No. 624) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana in the case of the British brig Dashing Wave and her cargo; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SUMNER presented a letter from the Secretary of State, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the British brig Dashing Wave; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867, have had it under consideration, and directed me to report it back with amendments. The Senate will see at once the importance of speedy action on that bill, and therefore I hope I shall not take too great a liberty if I ask action upon it at once.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. There will be no question about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 614) for the relief of Mrs. Alice A. Dryer;

A bill (H. R. No. 851) granting a pension to Ann Williams;

A bill (H. R. No. 886) for the relief of Mrs. Mary J. Trueman;

A bill (H. R. No. 991) for the relief of Zaddock T. Newman;

A bill (H. R. No. 1263) granting a pension to Joseph A. Fry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1295) granting a pension to William J. Cotty, late of the twenty-first Missouri infantry volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1315) for the relief of Seth Lea;

A bill (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Nancy Cook, of Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. No. 1332) for the relief of Barbara Stout, of Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. No. 1352) granting a pension to Sarah E. Ball, widow of James Ball, deceased, late fireman on the steamer Vedette, connected with the Burnside expedition;

A bill (H. R. No. 1383) granting a pension to Miss Ann E. Hamilton, of Alleghany city, Pennsylvania, aunt and adopted mother of James E. McKillip and Charles P. McKillip, deceased, late soldiers in the Union Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1384) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Lane, of Boston, Massachusetts, mother of John Lane, deceased, late a private in company A, twelfth regiment Massachusetts volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1385) granting a pension to Roslinda McCalee, widow of Barney McCalee, deceased, late a private in company I, tenth regiment New York cavalry volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1386) granting a pension to Hiram L. Hall;

A bill (H. R. No. 1387) granting a pension to Elizabeth G. Hibben, widow of Rev. Samuel Hibben, deceased, late a chaplain in the fourth cavalry regiment, Illinois volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1388) granting a pension to Kate Higgins;

A bill (H. R. No. 1389) granting a pension to Eliza Donnelly, mother of Dudley Donnelly, deceased, late colonel of the twenty-eighth regiment infantry, New York State volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1390) granting a pension to Michael Reilly; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1391) granting a pension to Jane McNaughton.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Miss Sue Murphy, reported a bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphy, of Decatur, Alabama; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that bill will be put upon its passage at once. It passed the Senate unanimously at the last session, but was lost in the House for want of time.

Mr. CATTELL. The Senate have agreed to take up Senate bill No. 543.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate have agreed to take up that bill, and so nothing else can be done except by common consent until that bill is disposed of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought that was not in order until we got through with petitions and reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not in order except by unanimous consent, and the Senate gave unanimous consent to take it up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to it until we present the morning business.

Mr. POMEROY. There were several Senators who objected to taking up that bill, but they were not able to make themselves heard, I suppose, by the Chair, on account of the noise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair certainly did not hear any objection. I wish Senators would object so that I can hear them, and keep the business in order. The bill mentioned by the Senator from New Jersey is before the Senate, as he calls it up.

TEMPORARY LOAN CERTIFICATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL, to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of saving the unnecessary payment of interest, and reducing the public debt, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make sale of ten millions of the surplus coin in the Treasury of the United States, on the first Monday of the month of August next, and on the first Monday of every month thereafter, till the amount of coin in the Treasury, exclusive of that for which gold certificates of deposit shall have been given, shall be reduced to the sum of $10,000,000, the sale to be made in manner following: The Secretary shall give five days' public notice in one daily newspaper published in each of the cities of Washington and New York, that sealed proposals for ten millions of gold coin will be received at the office of the Assistant Treasurer in the city of New York, till three o'clock past meridian of the day appointed for the sale. Such proposals shall be addressed to the Assistant Treasurer at New York, and shall be opened by him in the presence of such persons as may choose to attend at the time designated in the notice. No proposals shall be received unless accompanied by a certificate of deposit in the Treasury of the United States of five per cent. in currency of the amount of coin bid for in such proposal, which shall be received in part pay for the coin bid for, in case the bid is accepted, and if not accepted shall be returned to the party who made the bid. Payments may be received for coin in currency; and with the currency received he shall purchase and cancel any interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States, paying therefor not exceeding its current market value at the time. None but the highest bid shall be accepted for gold; and in case of different bids at the same rate, said bids shall be accepted only pro rata; and the Assistant Treasurer, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the right to reject all or any bids, if deemed by him less than the fair value of gold at the time.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether this amendment as it now stands is to be voted upon as a substitute or an additional section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an additional section. It was first offered as a substitute, but subsequently as an amendment by way of addition.

Mr. CONKLING. So that by adopting it we do not impair the original bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; it is offered as an additional section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Howard, Howe, McGroarty, Nye, Osborn, Pomerooy, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, and Welch—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Norton, Pool, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Tipton, Whyte, and Yates—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN MICHIGAN RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 276.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope we shall have an opportunity to make reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports will be received. The Chair will consider that a member offering a report while reports are in order objects to everything else.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senate to take up this bill and have it read, at least, for I am very anxious to have it passed at this session. It is a bill to grant lands to the Northern Michigan Railroad Company in extension of the Northern Pacific road.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill mentioned by him. Is there any objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope we shall not take it up now. I want to look at it. It is a very important bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, reported a bill (S. No. 627) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 617) to reduce the military peace establishment of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Martha Ann Wallace, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1363) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Fuerst, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD, from the joint Committee on Ordnance, submitted a report, accompanied by testimony taken by the committee; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret Doyle, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 628) for the relief of Margaret Doyle. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Z. M. Hall, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 338) exonerating certain vessels of the United States from the payment of tonnage fees to consular agents in Canada, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 331) to grant an American register to the Hawaiian brig Victoria, reported it, without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 485) to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines and Rock Island rapids, in the Mississippi river, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of underwriters of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Kentucky, praying an amendment of the judiciary acts; and the letter of C. H. Howard, assistant commissioner of refugees, freedmen, and abandoned lands, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 163) for the relief of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell. The joint resolution was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of John A. Neustaetter, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 76) providing for abatement of duties on merchandise damaged on the voyage of importation, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom referred the bill (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post roads, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 622) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the memorial of W. Scott Smith, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

EXPLORATIONS OF YELLOWSTONE RIVER.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print the report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the report of Brevet Brigadier General T. W. Reynolds on the exploration of the Yellowstone river and the country drained by that river, have had it under consideration, and direct me to report it back with an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, and I ask for its present consideration. The substitute only need be read.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to strike out all of the resolution after the word "resolved," and to insert:

That the report proper of General Reynolds upon his explorations in the valley of the Yellowstone river be printed, with the map, but without the illustrations; and that three thousand extra copies be printed and bound for the use of the Senate; and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return the appendixes to General Reynolds's report to the chief engineer of the Army of the United States.

Mr. ANTHONY. This report has been lying in the hands of the committee for a great while, and a number of Senators have spoken to us about it, urging the publication; but we have declined to report in favor of its publication on account of the great cost. This is a work with a great many engravings, and an edition of it would cost not less than $25,000. We have recommended the publication of the report proper, without any of the appendixes, the cost of which will be about twelve hundred dollars. This report is desired very much by the people of Dakota, Montana, and northern Iowa. It gives an account of a region which is very little known, and which is believed to abound in valuable minerals and in some timber that is not to be found anywhere else in that part of the country. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

PETITION RECOMMITTED.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the petition of E. Lockwood, agent for Charles Rosefield, which was reported upon unfavorably from the Committee on Claims, be recommitted to that committee, on the ground that further proofs have been furnished to the committee, and a new investigation ought to be made.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 628) giving the right of way to certain railway companies over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the reports of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of Joseph McGhee Cameron and Mary Jane Cameron, minor children of La Fayette Cameron, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 382) granting an increase of pension to Obadiah T. Plum;

A bill (S. No. 422) granting a pension to Maria Schweitzer and the children of Conrad Schweitzer, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 518) granting a pension to the widow and child of John P. Felty;

A bill (S. No. 547) granting a pension to John Sheets;

A bill (S. No. 314) for the relief of George T. Brien;

A bill (S. No. 383) granting a pension to John A. Weed and Elizabeth J. Weed, minor children of Robert T. Weed, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 517) granting a pension to the widow and children of Henry Brown; and

A bill (S. No. 521) granting a pension to the children of William M. Wooten, deceased.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 678) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1869.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The message also announced that the House further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, further insisted upon its amendment to said bill, asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said bill, and had appointed Mr. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM LAWRENCE of Ohio, and Mr. CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE of Wisconsin, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, further disagreed to by the House; and

On motion by Mr. CONKLING, it was

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill further disagreed to by the House, and agree to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CONKLING, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. MCCREERY.

LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. A resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office was referred to the Committee on Printing, and then referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who have reported it back with an amendment, to which the Committee on Printing have no objection; and it is desirable that that report should be printed at once, if it is to be printed at all. I therefore ask that that resolution may now be acted upon.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand copies be printed for the use of the Senate, and two thousand copies for distribution by the General Land Office of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1867, without the sketches or illustrations, and without the maps, except the connected map of the United States.

Resolved further, That an abridgement of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1867, containing such portions of it as may best encourage immigration, shall be prepared by him, without sketches or illustrations, and without maps, excepting the connected map of the United States; and that two thousand copies be printed for the use of the General Land Office; and also, that two thousand copies in English, three thousand copies in German, and one thousand copies in Swedish, be printed for distribution in Europe, under the direction of the Department of State.

Mr. POMEROY. That is not the amendment of the Committee on Printing, I believe. The Committee on Printing had an amendment to that resolution, and the Committee on Public Lands moved an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the recommendation of the Committee on Printing that has been read.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Printing struck out the number of copies in French, and the Committee on Public Lands simply recommend to restore it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, after the word "German" to insert "one thousand copies in French."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to move one other amendment to the resolution. This report has excited more interest than any one that has been presented this session, and I want the Senate to understand what we are about to do. The report came from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a number of maps, very valuable maps, I think, indeed, and if the Treasury was flush the Committee on Printing would have recommended their publication; but in the present condition of the Treasury we thought so large an expenditure, amounting perhaps to $75,000, would be inexpedient, and in this the Committee on Public Lands have agreed with us.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands were very desirous to have the maps published. They yielded, however, to some extent, to the pressure brought upon them by the Senate and the Committee on Printing. They did not agree unanimously on the question of the maps, but they did agree unanimously on the question of having some copies of the report printed in French. The Committee on Public Lands would recommend, if the Senate would concur, that the maps be printed. They think they are very valuable.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should consider it my duty to oppose that. The Committee on Printing recommended the printing of one map, a connected map of the United States, which was already engraved, and the cost of which would be only the paper and the printing; but upon revising the estimates I find that the publication of that map will cost so much, adding to the expense of the printing, that I think the printing of all the maps had better be postponed until some time when the Treasury is in a better condition to meet the expense. I therefore move to strike out the words "excepting the connected map of the United States;" so that no map shall be printed.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that will not be done; we ought to send out a map of the United States anyhow.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we had money enough in the Treasury I would send abroad all the maps; but I do not think, in the present condition of the Treasury, we ought to go to such expense. The cost of printing the maps in all the editions ordered will not be less than $10,000, to send abroad a map of the United States; and it must be folded up in a pamphlet, where it cannot be opened and folded back half a dozen times without being torn. I do not believe the map would be of very great use. I think the publication of the report in different languages may be of value. They have maps of this country everywhere. They are all over the world.

Mr. POMEROY. Any person receiving this map could take the map out of the pamphlet, and by pasting it preserve it as a very valuable map illustrating the territories of the United States. This Government is a landholder, and we cannot expect to dispose of the public lands unless we not only advertise them, but cause maps to be published showing where they lie, what is their extent, the mountains, and rivers, &c.—an outline map. That is all this is. It is not an extensive map. It is an outline map of the United States. I think it should go abroad among all the nations.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the map will be published. The report is of very little value without the map. You cannot understand what the report refers to without the map. It is not true that they have in Europe maps of our country, with the land divisions, townships, progress of the surveys, &c., that will give any idea of the country. A general map of the country without any particular localities is of no value. Our maps are extended by the survey yearly. They change almost in six months. They report merely the progress of the surveys. It is really a part of the history of the country, the most essential thing that can be published; and before this is passed over lightly I should like to have a letter of the Commissioner of the Land Office read. There is a great demand for this report in Europe. A great deal is said about encouraging foreign immigration, but there is nothing so well calculated to help that as showing persons abroad where they can go, and on want terms they can obtain land here.

Mr. ANTHONY. If my friend will allow me to make just one observation, whenever the Committee on Printing object to the printing of an expensive work we are told there is a great call for it. Mr. President, when valuable books are printed for nothing and given away there will always be a demand for them, and the more we print the larger will be the demand. I have no doubt about the value of this work. It is a very good document. The only thing is the question of expense.

Mr. STEWART. We do print a great many documents that are not very valuable. If there is one thing that we desire to encourage especially it is immigration on the public lands. We want the immigrants to go there. We want them to leave the cities, and the best thing we can do is to spend a little money in educating those people as to where they can go. The whole theory of the Government is that they shall be protected and these settlements shall be advanced. Nothing will help that work so much as a map of the country with such explanations as the report will give. I undertake to say that it is a more useful document than any other printed by Congress. It is a better guide and contains more useful information for the purpose of settling the public lands than any document that has ever been printed.

I am seldom an advocate for the expenditure of money; but I believe this is a case where money can be well expended. There is a great demand for it, especially by the Germans. A large number of letters were before our committee. I have seen a large number that did not come before the committee, addressed to the Department of State. The Secretary of State regards this matter as of very great importance. Mr. Seward says it is the best means of conveying that kind of information that brings in immigrants from their homes and induces them to go upon the lands. He is very much in favor of it. He has been in correspondence with our ministers abroad, and every person abroad who has taken the subject into consideration regards it as the most important information that can be given to the people.

The Commissioner has given this report a great deal of attention, bestowed great labor upon it, and when you are expending your millions per year for the Indian service I think you might spend a small amount in informing immigrants from Europe, particularly Germans, where these maps go, of the resources of the West, and let them go there and take possession of the country, and thus avoid the Indian question. You put into your Indian bill $75,000 for this and $100,000 for that, and you have a system of having probably five Indian agents to each Indian, and how many contractors to each Indian nobody can compute. While you are upholding a system of that kind I want the people of the world to understand what we have got in the way of lands, where they can go and take possession of the country. In that way we can end many of these vexatious questions and develop the resources of the country. I believe that a little money spent in publishing these reports and maps will be of great importance to the country. Then the maps of the States are exceedingly important in showing the advance of the surveys and what has been done. If this proposition is to be voted down, before it is voted down I should like to have one or two letters read. I think this is a very important subject, and I do not like to see it slurred over in this way.

Mr. POMEROY. By the report of the committee but one map, a connected map of the United States, was to be printed, and now the Senator from Rhode Island has moved to strike out even that. It does not include the maps of the States, to which the Senator from Nevada has referred. I agree with the Senator from Nevada that those maps are very desirable; but it is absolutely necessary to have the map of the United States, and the Senator from Rhode Island now proposes to strike out that. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not going to detain the Senate more than a minute on this subject. I merely wish the Senate to understand what the cost of this is to be, and then with whatever the Senate do I shall be satisfied. As this resolution came to the Committee on Printing the expense would have been $88,000; and if we had directed the publication the House of Representatives would probably have printed double the number, and we should not have got off with less than an expenditure of $300,000. The Committee on Printing reduced it to $25,000 by their report, and that report meets the approbation of the Committee on Public Lands. I now propose—not from the Committee on Printing, but I have revised the estimates and find the map will cost more than I thought it would—to make a further reduction of about eleven thousand dollars by striking out the map of the United States. I do not estimate the value of that map so highly as my friend upon the Committee on Public Lands; but perhaps I do not understand it so well. The Senate have now all the facts before them; and it is for them to decide whether they will expend $11,000 to distribute over Europe a map of the United States.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall be satisfied with a vote, as the morning hour has nearly expired.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The amendment, as I understand it, strikes the pictures out of the document.

Mr. ANTHONY. The map.

Mr. POMEROY. The map of the United States; nothing else.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very evident that my friend from Vermont desires to get a lick at it without knowing what it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Rhode Island says that his amendment strikes out simply the map of the United States.

Mr. ANTHONY. The other maps are not reported upon at all. The amendment saves $11,000 and deprives the document of the map of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. That strikes all the maps out?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee what the cost will be without the maps?

Mr. ANTHONY. Fourteen thousand dollars without and $25,000 with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. STEWART. On that question I must call for the yeas and nays. I wish to see whether the Senate are not willing to let settlers and emigrants know where the public lands are.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Osborn, Rice, Sherman, Welch, and Willey—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, McCreery, Nye, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Whyte, Williams, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Yates—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

The resolution was adopted.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM WINDOM of Minnesota, and Mr. P. VAN TRUMP of Ohio, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HOWE, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. MORRILL of Maine.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

Mr. SUMNER. I simply wish to have an understanding with my friend, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] as to the order of business. I shall not interpose any objection unless the Senator does.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I had an understanding that was satisfactory.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know just exactly what the Senator from Massachusetts means.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to take it up for consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to that motion. When it is up I wish to say a word.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot put it when Senators are on the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I understood the Senator to say he had no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to its coming up. When it comes up I wish to address a consideration to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand the question is before the Senate now as to whether we shall proceed with that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to the bill coming up, but when it is up I propose to address a proposition to the Senator who has charge of it, which I trust he will accept.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire in this connection to ask my friend from Massachusetts whether he is opposed to the consideration of the bill that I have called up?

Mr. SUMNER. I am perfectly ready to proceed with the consideration of that bill whenever the Senate is so disposed. Allow me to make an explanation here. It was only a moment ago that I exchanged a word with the Senator from Maine, and he told me there was an understanding between himself and the Senator from California as to the order of business. I thought the Senator was not aware that the bill was about to be called up, and it was on that account that I interposed the remark that I made.

Mr. CONNESS. I am still at a loss to know how the Senator stands affected toward this bill. If he is in favor of it, of course he is in favor of taking it up. I hope he is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I desire to say to the Senator from California what I did not suppose I should feel it my duty to say at the time that I antagonized another bill, and from some remark of mine he might have inferred that on to-day I should have nothing of this character to interpose. But the deficiency bill is now ready for consideration, and it is the last bill of any importance which the Committee on Appropriations has to present to the Senate. There are some items in it which will perhaps encounter some difficulty somewhere else, at any rate of a character which should induce us to get the earliest action upon the bill. Without any further statement, I appeal, therefore, to the Senator from California to allow his bill, now that it is up, to be laid aside informally in order to proceed with the consideration of the deficiency bill, which will not occupy, in my judgment, much time.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire in this connection of the honorable Senator how long he thinks the deficiency bill will occupy?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think a very short time. I have no expectation that any items will be controverted.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree with the honorable Senator there are items in that bill which perhaps make it important to give it early consideration, and therefore I agree that the bill now before the Senate shall lie over informally, and that the appropriation bill shall be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill that is before the Senate will be passed over informally, if there be no objection, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill. The Chair hears no objection.

—SUE MURPHY.

Mr. ANTHONY. There was a bill reported from the Committee on Claims this morning, which has passed the Senate once before, and was lost in the other House for want of time. It is to provide for a very hard case, and I am sure it will create no debate. I therefore ask the Senator from Maine to be kind enough to give way while the Senate bill No 625 is passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am on borrowed time myself. If the Senator from California has no objection, I shall make none.

Mr. ANTHONY. There shall be no debate about it.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphy, of Decatur, Alabama, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $7,000 in full compensation for damages done her farm by reason of the same being occupied for military purposes, and for the destruction of buildings and other property thereon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where does that bill come from?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do the committee introduce that principle?

Mr. HOWE. It has passed the Senate once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have an explanation of the bill. It strikes me that it introduces a principle which, if carried out, will give us a good deal of trouble. I do not know what the circumstances are.

Mr. HOWE. It introduces no new principle, I will say. It cannot, of course, because the identical bill, word for word, has passed the Senate once. This woman owned a house, and the house was unfortunately located. An officer under General Sherman directed the town of Decatur to be taken possession of and fortified. The officer who executed the order wanted to build a fort on the site of this house, and he took the house down and built the fort. This is to pay for that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have it go over. I move to postpone its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read; and if there be no objection, the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations will be acted on as they are reached in their order in the reading of the bill. The Chief Clerk proceed to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines fifty-four to sixty, as follows:

General Land Office:

For surveying the boundary line between the State of Nebraska and Territory of Colorado and the western boundary of the State of Nebraska, embraced between the forty-first and forty-third degrees of latitude, estimated two hundred and forty-three miles, at not exceeding twenty dollars per mile, $4,860.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines seventy, seventy-one, and seventy-two, as follows:

For casual repairs of the Patent Office building, to complete pavement on the lower floor of the south wing, $3,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am satisfied on further examination that this item ought not to be stricken out. I propose to retain it modified in the way I shall propose. It says "for casual repairs." That misled the committee. It should be "for tiles for the Patent Office building." I move to amend the clause so as to make it read:

For tiles for fifty-eight hundred feet of tiling for the basement story of the Patent Office building, to complete pavement of the lower floor of the south wing, at $1 25 per foot, $7,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion to strike out the clause as amended was not agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines eighty-four to one hundred and four, as follows:

Surveys of Indian reservations:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the balance due for surveys of lands embraced in the Osage Indian reservation and the Cherokee neutral lands, in the State of Kansas, under contracts dated respectively August 14 and 16, 1866, (the said sum to be returned to the Treasury out of proceeds of sales of said lands, as provided by treaties with said Indians,) $27,980 51: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to give validity to any treaty or part thereof which otherwise would be invalid.

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the balance due for surveys of the Omaha and Winnebago reservations, which have been completed under contract with the General Land Office, $3,362 62: Provided, That no contract for the survey of Indian lands under treaty stipulations, or for the survey of any public lands, shall hereafter be made with any person or persons until the appropriation necessary for the payment of such surveys shall have been made by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill till he reached the following clause, lines one hundred and seventy-six to one hundred and seventy-nine:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electric telegraph, (to supply deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867,) $40,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if there is a necessity for continuing this subsidy to the Atlantic and Pacific Electric Telegraph Company, and how long it is to be continued?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On the miscellaneous bill there was an appropriation for this service for the current year, and the character of the service was then pretty fully discussed. The Senator was not present; and for his information I will restate that this service results from an act of Congress passed in 1857, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized and directed to advertise for proposals for such a service as this, and was authorized to enter into a contract for a term of years—I think ten years, though I am not sure as to the time—and this contract is the result of it. First, the law authorized the service; in the second place, the contract provided for the service in accordance with the statute; so that it is a contract obligation resting on this statute. Now, I understand that the company have no particular desire upon this question. If the Government of the United States really thinks it is for its interest to put an end to this service, I am told, although I have no very good authority, perhaps, for saying it—I am not told directly from the managers of the company—they are not particularly solicitous on the subject, believing the contract to be a beneficial one to the Government. It is sufficient to say, to answer the inquiry, that this service is the result of a contract authorized by law, and this particular item is for a deficiency to supply that service, the appropriation for which was neglected last year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the deficiency arises from the action of Congress in striking out an appropriation of that amount for that year. Although it may be claimed that this contract is of advantage to the Government, I am quite confident that the managers of this telegraphic line are very anxious to have the subsidy continued. I know they were very anxious at the time the subject of striking it out was discussed. All that I wish to say is that the charges by this telegraph line are enormous, and it seems to be impossible to hold anybody responsible for these extravagant charges. It costs $10 50 to send any sort of a telegram from this city to Portland, in Oregon; and yet the fees are restricted by the act under which this line of telegraph is organized, and when a claim is made to the persons who are concerned in the management of this line they claim that somebody else is responsible; and in that way immense amounts of money are accumulated, as it seems to me, by these exorbitant charges, and there ought to be some remedy somewhere.

Here is a telegraph line across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific States. It receives from the Government $40,000 a year for performing, as it is alleged, services for the Government, and in addition to that it imposes these exorbitant charges. I have no desire to do the company any injury or interfere with the affairs of the Government; but it has occurred to me that while these charges were maintained there ought to be some means somewhere to correct the evil and relieve the people from these enormous burdens.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say that I agree entirely in what has been said by the Senator from Oregon. There is no greater monopoly in the world than exists now in the telegraph line that crosses this continent. I received the other day a comparatively short dispatch from California on public business, which cost $175 in gold. I think a high price for sending it would have been twenty dollars. Seven dollars and eighty cents I think is charged for ten words between this place and San Francisco, and if collected there it is collected in gold; and we appropriated here annually $40,000 as a bonus to this line without exercising any restriction whatever over them. When the line was first established it was, of course, a great venture; and high rates proportioned to those that were charged when the Atlantic cable was first a success across the Atlantic were to have been expected; but the company owning the Atlantic cable have reduced their rates, and still further reductions are in progress notwithstanding the immense capital invested in that enterprise. We should either withdraw this appropriation until some restriction is imposed upon the company as to the rates to be charged, or else we should impose it in connection with the appropriation. I move to strike out the paragraph at present.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This matter was very thoroughly examined in the Committee on Finance at one time, and these complaints were made of overcharges to individuals. The rates, I think, from the terminus of the telegraph proper on this side to the other are fixed by law; but the line is connected with certain other companies, and the great majority of the communications go over the lines of these other companies, which are associated with them, before they reach the telegraph line proper; and although I believe they do not charge or profess to charge anything more than the rates fixed by the law for that which goes over the Atlantic and Pacific telegraph proper, yet they so manage it in reference to the other lines as to make up a very large charge for the whole. That is the exposition of the way they do it. How far that is correct or proper it is not for me to say. I know nothing about what should be the rates, but the fact is that it makes no sort of difference to us. The Senator from California is entirely mistaken in calling this appropriation a bonus. It is not a bonus, and never has been. There has not been a year since the telegraph was established that the Government messages did not amount to more than $40,000, according to the rates fixed by law for telegraphic communications to and from the Pacific coast.

We had Mr. Orton, president of the company, before us after we struck this item out one year. He came before us and explained. He said that when he became president of the company he found that there were many abuses which they were endeavoring to correct; that they had not been able to find out exactly how they arose in all cases, but they were satisfied that they were imposed upon, and that the community were imposed upon by their own operatives. He was engaged in reforming those things as far as he could. He said, and said very properly, that it made no difference to the company whether we appropriated $40,000 directly here, as we are obliged to do by law, or whether we paid the bills for actual messages sent over the line. To the extent of the $40,000 they are compelled to transmit the messages of the Government at fixed rates.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does that fixed rate include the connections?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know; but I have not heard of any complaints on the part of the Government. The complaints have been on the part of individuals. This contract originally was made with a view of assisting the telegraphic company. They did not know how they would come out, and we engaged by law to give them $40,000 annually for a certain number of years, and so far the Government used the telegraph that $40,000 were to be repaid in messages. During the war particularly the amount sent over the line, as I understand, was very considerable; I do not know how much larger than the $40,000; so that in reality it is no bonus.

Mr. CONNESS. Forty thousand dollars at their rates would amount to very little.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how far those rates are applied to the Government; but I do not know of any complaint on the part of the Government of any imposition. Possibly they may have dealt with the Government on different terms. But it is of no use for us to strike out the appropriation, as we found. It has been appropriated this year for the current year in another bill. The striking out one year was by way of experiment, in order to get an explanation. We thought it best to strike it out and see what could be done; but it was ascertained, from the very fact that the Government had more telegraph dispatches than would amount to $40,000, that it was no use for us to attempt to punish them by breaking our contract to give them $40,000 a year. So far as the stipulations of the contract on their part are concerned to the Government, they have performed them. These complaints of individuals must be met by individuals as they can; they afford no excuse, in my judgment, for the Government breaking its contract to pay them so much a year, to be repaid in telegraphic dispatches. It has been repaid, and more.

As I said before, it amounts to nothing if we refuse to make this appropriation, for we have to make it in another way, to enable the Government to pay its bills, so that nothing will be accomplished. I think, therefore, it is better to let the appropriation remain. We found by very thorough examination that nothing can be accomplished in that way.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose that if we do not make the appropriation now it will be made in another bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not this year.

Mr. CONNESS. Not this year, undoubtedly, but we shall pay the amount of money. I know we refused to make the appropriation on a previous occasion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is the very occasion we refused it; and here is a deficiency bill brought in to make it up.

Mr. CONNESS. The case stands, nevertheless, as a great hardship; and I am not willing to admit that the Government cannot regulate the rates to be charged over this line.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Congress is to do it, if anybody; the executive Government cannot do it, and the executive Government owes this money.

Mr. CONNESS. I mean Congress when I say the Government, for I believe it has been generally acknowledged by this time that Congress at least makes up a considerable portion of the Government. I think a provision attached to this appropriation, if there was time to get it up, or if the committee's attention had been brought to it, would be a very healthy proceeding. The State of California agreed to pay $6,000 per annum for ten years in the same way to encourage the construction of this line; but the public money they have received, and the assurances that they receive for it, have only enabled them to set up a tariff of charges on the people which are onerous and oppressive. They are thus also enabled, whenever any company undertakes to construct another line, to buy it out and suppress it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If anything could be accomplished by it, I would be perfectly willing to try the experiment as I did once before.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the amendment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read the next items of the bill, as follows:

Construction branch of the Treasury Department:

For constructing the custom-house at Portland, Maine, $50,000.

For constructing the court-house at Portland, Maine, $50,000.

For constructing appraisers' stores at Philadelphia, $25,000.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to have the chairman give some information as to the two items just read in regard to Portland, Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Those items are for deficiencies in the appropriations for the new buildings in process of erection at Portland for a court-house and custom-house to supply those destroyed by the great fire there. The architect in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury states the necessity of it.

Mr. CONNESS. This is to replace buildings destroyed by fire in that city?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Then it is all right.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after the appropriation of $27,500 for completing certain portions of the Washington aqueduct to strike out the following proviso in lines two hundred and twenty-five, two hundred and twenty-six, two hundred and twenty-seven, and two hundred and twenty-eight:

Provided, That the sum shall be in full of all claims against the Government for work done or damages incurred on the Washington aqueduct, and all work on said aqueduct shall be forthwith discontinued.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to offer an amendment to this part of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the Senator will allow the question to be taken on this, and he can propose his amendment afterward.

Mr. HARLAN. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. Now I offer this amendment to come in after the lines just stricken out:

For salary of assistant engineer, superintendence, and repairs, for the year ending June 30, 1869.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines two hundred and twenty-nine to two hundred and thirty-three, in the following words:

Rock Island arsenal:

For the erection of a bridge to connect Rock Island and arsenal with the city of Rock Island, Illinois, $20,000; said bridge to be constructed and completed for the sum hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line two hundred and forty-one:

To supply a deficiency for reporting and printing the proceedings of the Senate in the Daily Globe, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines two hundred and fifty-eight and two hundred and fifty-nine, to strike out "$10,180 68" and insert "$2,500;" so as to make the clause read:

To reappropriate an unexpended balance of an appropriation made by act approved August 5, 1864, "to refund to the State of California expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities," said balance having lapsed and been covered into the Treasury on the 30th of June, 1863, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and eighty-nine, to strike out the word "in" after "deficiency," and insert "for steamship mail;" so as to make the clause read:

For deficiency for steamship mail service between the United States and Brazil during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, $12,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have an amendment, to come in after line three hundred and nineteen, to which I think there will be no objection, and I may as well offer it now:

For continuing the filling and grading of the Capitol grounds, under the direction of the architect of the Capitol extension, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Committee on Appropriations proposed, in the second section of the bill, after the word "Washington," in line twenty-two, to insert "any part of which is to be paid for by the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the second section by striking out, in lines nineteen and twenty, the words "repealed and no" and inserting "so modified that the;" by striking out in line twenty-two the words "any part of," and inserting "authorized by said act;" by striking out, in lines twenty-three and twenty-four, the words "shall hereafter be made until an appropriation shall have been made therefor, and such appropriation when made," and inserting "hereafter" after "shall," in line twenty-five;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the chief engineer of the Army shall reimburse to the corporation of the city of Washington for expenses incurred in improving the property of the General Government in said city, under provisions of act of May 15, 1864, and in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, in book of estimates of appropriations, pages 244 and 245, $206,943 85: Provided, That section fifteen of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Washington and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," approved May 15, 1820; and section three of an act approved May 5, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," are hereby so modified that the improvements of the streets, alleys, avenues, or other property of the United States, in the city of Washington, authorized by said act, which is to be paid for by the United States, shall be hereafter expended under the direction of the chief engineer of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

SENATORS FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask permission to interrupt the proceedings on this bill for the purpose of presenting to the Senate the ratification by the State of Louisiana of the fourteenth constitutional amendment, and the credentials of the Senators-elect from that State. I ask that they be read, and that the oaths be administered to the Senators-elect.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana, ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be designated the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution proposed to the several States by the Congress of the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the credentials of Hon. William Pitt Kellogg, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana for the term expiring March 4, 1878; and the credentials of Hon. John S. Harris, elected by the Legislature of Louisiana a Senator in Congress for the term expiring March 4, 1871.

The oaths prescribed by law were administered to Messrs. HARRIS and KELLOGG, and they took their seats in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 344) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund duties paid on a chime of bells and clock imported for St. Joseph's cathedral, Buffalo, New York, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Washington Target-shooting Association in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 678) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1869;

A bill (H. R. No. 761) to construct a wagon-road from West Point to Cornwall Landing, all in the county of Orange, State of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co. and Peter Rosecrantz;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 829) to amend the fourteenth section of the act approved July 28, 1868, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes;" and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) for the relief of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

The third section of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no contract shall be entered into for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement whatever, which shall bind the Government to pay a larger sum of money than the amount in the Treasury appropriated for the specific purpose, and no person shall be employed by any Department of the Government unless an amount of money shall have been previously appropriated sufficient to pay all such persons. And if any officer of the Government shall knowingly contract for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose, or shall knowingly employ any persons in any Department of the Government unless an appropriation sufficient to pay all such persons shall have been previously made, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years, and shall pay a fine of $2,000, and shall thereafter be deemed incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

The Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend the section by striking out, from lines six to nine, the following words:

And no person shall be employed by any Department of the Government unless an amount of money shall have been previously appropriated sufficient to pay all such persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee further proposed to amend the section by striking out the following words from line fourteen to line seventeen:

Or shall knowingly employ any persons in any department of the Government unless an appropriation sufficient to pay all such persons shall have been previously made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee also proposed to strike out the following words at the close of the section: And shall thereafter be deemed incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to know why that amendment is recommended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee recommended that these words be stricken out, because it was considered that in addition to being punished by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years and by a fine of $2,000 it was a little sharp to disqualify a man for holding office for life.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You thought the fine and imprisonment punishment enough?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We thought that imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than two years, and a fine of not less than $2,000, were punishment enough.

Mr. HOWE. Punishment enough?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. Then it leaves the question necessarily whether such a man as has been submitted to these penalties, has stayed in the penitentiary a year or two, should be capable of holding office.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is no objection to a man who has paid the forfeit of the law being restored to citizenship, and so entitled to his confidence and trust again. This is a perpetual disqualification.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, I see it is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The punishment itself is a disqualification. Of course a man guilty of an infamous offense would be disqualified from holding any office so long as that stain remains.

Mr. HOWE. So long as he was in the penitentiary?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So long as he has not been restored.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand that as a necessary consequence of the commission of this crime he would be rendered incapable of holding office. He is rendered incapable only by force of the judgment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think of an instance in any of the States where under their constitutions and laws such a man rendered infamous by the commission of a crime is eligible to an office while that remains. Usually in the constitutions of the States there is relief for such a case through the Executive by the pardoning power; but so long as the infamy remains it is one of the features in our policy that a man who has been subjected to punishment for an infamous crime is not eligible to office.

Mr. HOWE. I think the offenses are numerous described in the statutes of all the States which do not include disqualification for office among the penalties. But if this is a disqualification by the laws of a State it does not do any harm to the individual to include it in the statute here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Would the Senator think it advisable to put in a statute of the country, a law of the land, that all Federal officers who should be subjected to the penalty of this section should be forever thereafter prohibited from holding an office of trust superadded to the penalty of imprisonment and fine.

Mr. HOWE. Yes; I should think it highly desirable.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee did not think so. It is a question for the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will strike out this section. It seems to me the most extraordinary section I ever saw in an appropriation bill. I doubt very much whether Senators have read it. What does it propose? To declare that if any person shall engage any thing to be done for the Government for a larger sum of money than is appropriated by law he shall be sent to the penitentiary and be fined, and in addition thereto be forever disfranchised. I have no doubt that this is done every day, that it is necessarily done from the very nature of the business. You appropriate this year $100,000 for carrying on a public work, with the understanding that another $100,000 will be appropriated the next year; and contracts are every day made for the lumber or for the stone to be used in the construction of that work, and those contracts are made not only covering the present but future appropriations. As a matter of course Congress, by refusing to appropriate, can stop the work; but contracts are made with a view to future appropriations. It has been done ever since the foundation of the Government.

This section provides that "if any officer of the Government shall knowingly contract for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose," such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. There is no officer of the Government but what from the nature of his duties will be compelled to violate this law if it be passed, and no man will ever be prosecuted under it, because the fallacy of it is so plain. Not only that, but the language is such any lawyer can readily see that no man could be convicted under it. It is a mere snare, a mere delusion. Your Sergeant-at-Arms violates every day the provision I have just read, and his deficiencies are made up by deficiency bills. He could be sent to the penitentiary under this section for buying a chair for a committee-room until he ascertained that an appropriation had been made for that specific purpose. You cannot carry on the operations of a great Government like this in such a way. It is idle to pass it. The Committee on Appropriations have made it a little better than it was originally, but as it came from the House the section provided that "no person shall be employed by any Department of the Government unless an amount of money shall have been previously appropriated sufficient to pay all such persons," and if anybody is so employed, the man employing him is to be sent to the penitentiary. Who believes in such a provision as that in a law?

But that is not all. The first clause provides that if anybody shall do this—make any contract for furnishing any public building or improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger sum of money than that appropriated for the specific purpose, he shall be sent to the penitentiary. No man can bind the Government, and no man can be literally guilty under this law, and if anybody should be prosecuted under it there is not an attorney in the United States who could not clear him on the ground that the contract did not bind the Government to pay any more than was appropriated according to law, because the Constitution says that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law, and consequently the contract would not be binding on the Government for an amount greater than the appropriation. Therefore, under the phraseology of this section no one could be convicted; but honest officers might be pestered and bothered by it. I trust the Senate will strike out the section. It is something unknown and unheard of before in legislation, and totally improper, it seems to me, in connection with any appropriation bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is rather the most remarkable section, take it as a whole, that I ever saw in a bill especially an appropriation bill. The part of it already stricken out provided that if anybody in any of the Departments should employ any person before an appropriation was made to pay him, he should be sent to the penitentiary. The committee very properly struck that out; and I should like to know how our Government could get along this very year under such a law? The appropriation bills for the support of the Departments have not been passed till after the expiration of the last fiscal year. Consequently, if this law had been in operation on the 1st of July, the Treasury Department would have had to discharge every one of its employés, and shut up the building, or else the Secretary would have to go to the penitentiary; and so it is of every other Department. Congress, which never passes its appropriation bills till the last moment, and in the long session frequently not until after the next fiscal year begins, here proposes to say that if it shall omit to provide by its appropriation bills for the payment of the employés in the Departments the Secretaries shall shut up the Departments or go to the penitentiary. That is about the amount of it. What a perfect absurdity on its very face in view of our practice!

The other provision is just as bad with our mode of appropriating for public buildings. We do not appropriate in any case the whole sum necessary to erect a public building. Frequently we get an estimate, and when we have the estimate, what is our course? To appropriate as much money as we think can be used the first year, and no more. That is the course of the Government. What, then, would be the result of such a provision as this? The plan of the building being agreed upon, its character being understood, estimated to cost so much, the superintending architect, instead of contracting for his material at once, making his plans and contracting for the delivery of his materials at the time he wants them, must do what? Suppose the appropriation is $50,000, and the stone which he will want for the completion of the building will cost $150,000. He must make his contract within the $50,000 for the year, and then he will be at the mercy of the contractors for the excess, for they know he must go on in the same way and he must have it at any rate. The thing is an absolute absurdity on its face. The architect called my attention to it, and said to me, "I cannot make a contract for erecting a building; it is out of the question; I cannot make half a contract or quarter of a contract, because Congress appropriates only half or quarter the amount of money necessary to complete the work." Take the case of $150,000 worth of stone being required for putting up a custom-house or any other building. Under this provision he must make his plan and specify exactly what he wants before he can make a contract. In what a situation would he be if he put out proposals for a contract for $50,000 worth? He can get no contract upon any reasonable terms, and he must go to the penitentiary if he does not. He tells me it is impossible to erect buildings in that way without costing the Government an enormous sum.

The fact is, sir, that we must either change our own system of action or we must have some confidence in our public servants and go on in the way we have gone on, guarding it all we can. But in this case the difficulty in both instances arises from the fault of Congress itself in the mode it does business, and it is useless to attempt to embarrass the Government in this way. I hope the whole section will be struck out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are some difficulties under the practice which has prevailed against which this section was aimed.

That an abuse has grown up in the practice which makes such a bill as this necessary at the close of every session, and I do not know but at the beginning—for I think we had a deficiency bill in the beginning and one in the middle, and now certainly one at the end of the session—cannot be denied. To a very great extent these bills grow out of a practice of persons engaged in the public service expending more money than is appropriated for the particular service, and it does not always grow out of the fact that they did not foresee what was to be the necessary expenditure. There is a case in point in this very bill on the ninth page; I only refer to it by way of illustration, because it furnishes an illustration:

For remodeling the marine hospital at Chelsea, Massachusetts, $45,000.

That is a deficiency. How did it occur? Simply not having a sufficient appropriation the Government officer went on and spent that much more than he was authorized to spend than he had any appropriation for. It was not that the building cost any more than he had supposed it would, but he spent what he had, and then he went on and made a contract with innocent parties who knew nothing about the facts, who expended this money, and then the Government officers come here and ask for a deficiency bill. How did it come to be a deficiency? By his assuming to spend what was not appropriated for and what he had no reason to assume ever would be appropriated for. The appropriating power was never informed in regard to his purpose to spend that money. I bring this up by way of illustration only, to show that there is an abuse on the part of public officers in expending more money than is contemplated by Congress or than is asked for.

What the remedy is I do not know. I do not know that this provision is well considered, but it seemed to the Committee on Appropriations that there is an obvious distinction between the feature of the section as it now stands and those features that it contained as it came from the House of Representatives. It will be seen that now its aim is to prevent public officers from expending more money than has been appropriated for the particular purpose; that if money is appropriated to build a court-house or a custom-house the officers shall be at liberty to expend the amount appropriated and no more. I do not know what the practical inconvenience would be; those who are better acquainted with the service of the country will know better than myself; but I really see no difficulty in a public officer who has the supervision and construction of a public building informing the appropriate authority precisely what he wants, what his estimates are, how much he will want this year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is almost invariably done, but Congress says, "You shall have but so much this year." Suppose, for instance, a public building is to be built of a certain material and to cost $500,000. Congress says you may build according to a specific plan. The plan is always exhibited. The estimate is made of how much that building is to cost, showing what is to be the character of the building. The stone, for instance, is to cost so much. That must be contracted for, and contracted for beforehand. Proposals must be put out to furnish the stone, and the whole of it, for that building, not a portion of it. You cannot contract for a portion of it with one quarry and a portion of it with another at different times; the contract must be made for the whole. Suppose you appropriate only $100,000, and the stone is to cost $150,000, what are you to do? Are you to say that the officer shall only contract for $50,000 worth of stone during the year? What is the result of that to be? The Government will be placed in the hands of the contractor.

I have been familiar with the mode in which this business has been done, and while undoubtedly in individual cases there may have been abuse and carelessness, this is no way to reach it, because you will by this course embarrass the transaction of business, and you will be involved in a greater expenditure than would otherwise be necessary. You must seek a remedy in another way. You must in the first place find out what your building is to cost, and appropriate at once the whole amount. That will be the better way unquestionably, and the cheaper way in the end, and save money.

Mr. HOWE. Then why not do it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. We never have done it. Ask the Committee on Appropriations in the other House why they do not do it. They never will do it, because they do not want the appropriations to look too large for this year. The system is undoubtedly a bad one, and it ought to be reformed. If you reform it you may then properly, perhaps, apply this remedy; but you cannot apply this remedy where you follow the system which has been invariably followed for a long course of years with regard to the erection of public buildings. It is because we do not want to appear to make large appropriations; we do not want to draw too heavily on the income for the year. If you have a large expenditure of public money for public buildings in a particular year, you may overrun your receipts; you may not have the money on hand. Consequently the reasoning is: draw for so much on our receipts this year, and so much next year, and so much the year after. You do not take it all at once, because if you did there would be a deficiency in the receipts. Consequently the practice has been adopted of, in the first place, having an estimate for your building, showing how much it will cost, the style of building, with drawings, &c., and when they have done that Congress appropriates as much money as it thinks can be spent in the first year. As long as you do that you necessarily impose upon the architect of the building, with a view to economy, that a contract shall be made for all the materials he may want of a particular kind. Any one of us, if he was about to build a house, would want to know what the whole of it would cost, would want to make his contract with somebody to furnish all the materials, stone or brick, or whatever it might be. That is more especially true with reference to a large public building, costing $500,000. You cannot meet the thing in the way here proposed; for, as I said before, under this provision, if the appropriation will only allow you to get $50,000 worth of material, when $150,000 is needed, when you make your contract for the $50,000 and the year expires you will be next year at the mercy of the contractor. Suppose it is stone, and you have a contract with the owner of a quarry; it must all come from the same quarry, and what will he say to you next year? "I do not care about furnishing any more; I cannot furnish any more at this price; you must give me double;" and the Government must pay him what he asks, or it will have to erect its building of different kinds of stone.

I say, then, this is impracticable; and under the present system the thing here forbidden must necessarily be done; you cannot avoid it. I hope the whole section will be stricken out, and that some proper remedy will be found.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have not heard any better remedy than this suggested, and I am unwilling to believe that some remedy may not be devised. The abuses of the present mode of doing business are manifest. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] mentioned one patent upon the face of this bill. You had a hospital for the care of the sailors in the merchant service of the United States at Chelsea. I never saw it; but I am told it was one of the finest buildings in the country, abundantly adequate for every purpose. We find here in this bill an appropriation of $45,000 for improvements, for remodeling that marine hospital. I tried to convince the Senate the other day that you ought never to have invested a cent in marine hospitals anywhere. You do not do it in those cities where there is the largest commerce. The Secretary says it is unnecessary; but this was done; this building was erected. The officers in charge, it seems, thought they could make it better. We are informed by the architect that they applied for permission to make it better, to remodel it; he told them no; there was no appropriation; they applied again, he told them no. He steadfastly resisted the attempt to remodel it, but in defiance of his resistance they went on and made a contract, and the work has been done. Congress never has been consulted, never has assented; the architect was consulted and refused, but the work has been done; and here are poor mechanics clamoring at the doors of Congress to be paid. What can you do? You cannot very well refuse to pay these men; here is the appropriation to pay them; they have done the work; they have done it on your building; and so I suppose we have got to pay them; but it was the most wanton disregard of law and of official duty that I can conceive of. If you tolerate this your Treasury stands wide open to the demand of every employé you have. He can make his contracts, no matter whether they minister to the public interest or not; he makes his contracts, goes on and executes them, and you come in and pay them to save innocent men from the consequences of his wrong.

The other day we had a similar case before us. Your late Commissioner of Agriculture had certain moneys in his hands appropriated for the purpose of buying seeds. He expended that money, and when he had expended that money he went on the credit of the United States; he went into your cities and purchased on the credit of the nation. The parties with whom he dealt could not know how much money he had; they could not know how much he had expended; and he ran up bills to the amount of between forty and fifty thousand dollars, and died, and these creditors presented their bills here. The Government had got the seeds and distributed them; we could not very well refuse to pay for them, and we did appropriate the money to pay for those seeds, but we attached to that bill a provision similar to this, but not as strong as this. The Senate did not dissent from that; no man objected to it; it was acquiesced in all around as a reasonable provision.

And now, Mr. President, how will you protect the Treasury if you do not declare this to be a crime which you know in your conscience is a crime? How are you going to prevent the perpetration of it? The late Commissioner of Agriculture never would have been disturbed in the possession of his office if the Almighty had not disturbed him. The gentlemen in charge of the hospital at Chelsea will not be disturbed in the possession of their offices; why? Because they have done nothing that the law prohibits expressly. They have squandered money, to be sure, $45,000; but that is nothing. Congress comes in and appropriates and draws on the pockets of the people for it. How shall we prevent it? How shall we protect the Treasury? What are the evils in the way of this?

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] tells us that it is necessary for the architect who has charge of the construction of public buildings, when you undertake to build one, to contract for all his materials at once. I do not believe that it is always necessary to do that; but if it be necessary to do that you can provide for it very handily. I hold myself that it is essential to the welfare of the public service that the Legislature, without whose consent no dollar ought to be paid out of the Treasury, should be advised, to begin with, just the style of building that you propose to erect, and as near as calculation can attain to it, the cost of the building; and when that is done, you know the exact enterprise in which you are embarked, and you can make the appropriation this year just as well as next year and two years hence. It will not strain upon the people any harder to make it this year than to distribute the appropriations through three years. If the building is going to occupy three years the payments will occupy the three years and you will have three years to provide for the money in the Treasury.

But this loose way of entering on these enterprises is fraught with other difficulties besides those to which I have called attention. You commenced the construction of the buildings simply by appropriating a certain sum of money. The community in which the building is to be placed may have in their mind a building that will cost one hundred and fifty or five hundred thousand dollars, and instead of informing the Legislature as to what the building is to cost, what the style of it is, out of what materials it is to be constructed, the Legislature is simply called on to make an appropriation of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars for such a work and they make the appropriation; it is spent; the work is not completed; it is only in progress, and you are asked to make an appropriation next year of $100,000, and you make it; and so you go on till they cease to call for appropriations when you have some reason to conclude that the building is completed. That I understand to be frequently the case. I do not know that it is the practice of the present architect, but I have reason to know that a great many public buildings have been commenced and have been prosecuted in just that way. It is an unsafe and a dangerous way of managing this business. I think the Senator from Maine, I think every Senator, will concede that it is better to have a specific plan agreed upon and provided before a dollar is appropriated; and then when you know what the work is to be and the cost, there is no difficulty in making the appropriation; nor is there any difficulty in the architect's making a contract if he finds it necessary to make a contract. Inasmuch as the work of construction is to continue two or three years, he may make a contract for the whole amount of work, but to be paid for as the appropriations are made. Then he does not violate this act; then you need not make the appropriations save as the work progresses; you can continue the existing method of making appropriations.

This I think is manifest, that if you agree once that contracts in anticipation of future appropriations shall not be made, that the faith of the nation shall not be pledged by those who have no authority to plight it, then your legislation will conform to that state of things, and you may make your laws and your appropriations in harmony with it; you will do it; and there will be no danger of getting your architect or your Secretary of the Treasury, or any body else in the State prison unless he means to defy the law.

But what I protest against, Mr. President, is the disposition which seems to me too prevalent here and elsewhere to hold up these enormous abuses of official duty, of official administration, to just hold them up to the public gaze and pass them, saying, "This is improper," but take no single step to put an end to it. I think when you agree that a practice is frequent and that it is wrong, then it is the bounden duty of the Legislature to do the best it can to put an end to it. I never knew but one means for legislation to put an end to rascality, and that is to prohibit it, and prohibit it under penalties; and that is just the method suggested by this section. If the penalties are too severe make them milder; but I should rather abate something from the term of imprisonment, or a few dollars from the fine, than to strike out this last clause so as to leave the unfaithful servant qualified to hold office again if he can induce the public to trust him again and expose the public to having such servants foisted on them once more. I think we should leave that man out of the public service through the remainder of his natural life even if you do not see fit to put him in the penitentiary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the last clause of the third section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I submit a motion that that whole section be stricken out.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, Welch, Whyte, Willey, and Williams—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Harlan, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Ross, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade and Wilson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Kellogg, McCreery, Morton, Pool, Rice, Saulsbury, Stewart and Yates—20.

So the section was stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer an amendment to come in on page 7, after line one hundred and thirty-nine; I am informed it has been omitted by mistake:

For expenses of detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coin of the United States, and other frauds on the revenue, $25,000.

This is the usual appropriation for that purpose; I have no doubt the fact that it is not provided for is an omission.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe it is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Commerce, I offer an amendment to come in after the word "dollars," in line two hundred and seven:

For the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors heretofore commenced under authority of law, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $1,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan, who proposes this amendment as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, what relation it has to the bill from the House of Representatives for the improvement of rivers and harbors, &c.?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that the House passed a bill appropriating $6,370,000. The bill came in at a very late day, and the Committee on Commerce hardly had time to examine the bill, and hence concluded to propose $1,000,000 for the prosecution of those works now in process of construction, which will carry them through until the close of navigation, when work will cease. The bill has not been acted upon; but this is a substitute for that at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee does not propose to bring that bill forward at all?

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at this session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that is a great improvement.

Mr. CONNESS. It seems to me that there is one serious difficulty connected with this proposition. I rose to ask a question propounded by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether this amendment was to be in lieu of the river and harbor bill; and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce replies affirmatively. Now, then, it has this shape, that the Committee on Commerce have taken out some chosen cases from the entire river and harbor bill—

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce has done no such thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand it takes a round sum, $1,000,000, to be spent by the War Department in their discretion.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors heretofore commenced under authority of law, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $1,000,000.

Mr. CONNESS. That is it, sir; "heretofore commenced under authority of law." The works heretofore commenced are to be prosecuted at the expense of $1,000,000; but works not heretofore commenced but projected, and as necessary as those heretofore commenced, or more so, are to be put off. That is the case. It is simply an appropriation for a partial service, and it is therefore chosen from the river and harbor bill. That is to say, the committee decide that the works in progress shall be continued at the expense of $1,000,000, and that the bill referred to them shall not be considered further. Well, sir, I do not think this is just. I do not think it is just what we should do. I should like to have from the Committee on Commerce or from the chairman of that committee some exposition of the special works to which this $1,000,000 is to be applied—what are those works and where are they—so that we may have the means of judging of their importance, and whether any of them will suffer by delay? May not this appropriation of $1,000,000 or a part of it be retained in the Treasury with as little injury to the public service as the retention as to the other works perhaps in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce has not abandoned that bill by any manner of means. The bill having passed the House is a live bill until the 4th of March next. The committee do propose to take it up at the earliest moment of the next session. The season for carrying on the works is now far advanced. It would be after the 1st of August before any new work could be commenced. There are various works—I cannot name them all—that have been commenced, which a small sum would carry through until the close of navigation or the time to close operations upon these public works. After consultation with the Secretary of War, the committee were of opinion that this $1,000,000 would not be the appropriation requisite to go through as is customary to the end of the fiscal year, the 30th of June, but would carry the works through to the close of navigation and the close of actual operations this season. Therefore the committee agreed to defer final action upon the House bill and to propose that this $1,000,000 be put in the hands of the Secretary of War for the judicious prosecution and preservation of the works already commenced.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the Senator had better adhere to the amendment of which he gave the Committee on Appropriations notice. I see that the Senator's amendment to-day does not conform to the amendment of which he gave us notice; and I am led to remark that distinction by the remarks of the Senator from California; and perhaps the original amendment would obviate some of the criticisms and objections he has to this. It reads in this way:

One million dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public work on rivers and harbors.

I happen to be a member of the Committee on Commerce, but have been so much engaged in the duties of the Committee on Appropriations as not to be able to give much attention to that measure.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would as soon have it in that form, and will accept the modification.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say, in a general way, that there are difficulties at this period of the session in the way of making the appropriations presented in the river and harbor bill from the House of Representatives. As the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has stated, it appropriates between six and seven millions. It is a pretty large sum of money to appropriate just at this particular time, and in this condition of the finances of the country; and it is particularly embarrassing from the fact that when Congress met it was understood from the other branch, in which the appropriations for the public service generally originate, that this year we were to be confined to appropriations for such as were works of necessity; that the appropriations were to be limited, and be limited to the exigencies of the service. So at a very early day the appropriation bill for works of defense, the ordinary annual appropriation for which is between two and three million dollars, was sent to this branch of the Legislature, and to its appropriate committee, with but a single $200,000 appropriated, and that in language and in phrase which limited it simply to the repair and preservation of those works, showing that nothing was to be done even for the completion of the works unfinished. The branch gradually accepted that proposition upon the general understanding that such were the exigencies of the country this year, such were the financial exigencies of the country, that we could not even make the ordinary appropriations for the public works of defense.

Now, sir, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has said, at a very late day in this session, after the House of Representatives had agreed upon a day of adjournment only two weeks ahead, they sent a bill to this branch appropriating between six and seven million dollars for a great variety of purposes, not for the completion, not for the repair, not for the preservation of works already begun, but for the extension of works, for new works, new enterprises, some of them of an experimental character, and one particular item of $2,500,000 or nearly that, altogether new. And, Mr. President, you will see that it devolved upon the Committee on Commerce at this period in the session a duty which, under the circumstances, I submit with the best efforts and the best intentions and the best purposes to subserve the public interests. It was hardly to be expected, devoting all their time and energy to it, that they could accomplish it, notwithstanding; and it was not, I need not say, quite in harmony with what had been understood, and not quite in harmony with what Congress has practiced or attempted to practice in every other branch of the service. You may have rigidly determined that this year you would raise no salaries, that you would appropriate no money for contingencies which were not absolute necessities. You have held that the defense of the country demanded this, that the public credit demanded it; and in this view I am rather of the opinion that the Committee on Commerce judged wisely that at this late period in the session of the little opportunity for examination into the great variety of subjects presented by that bill from the House. The best thing that can be done under the circumstances is to hold the bill which the House has sent for further deliberation, and in the mean time appropriate so much money at the disposal of the Secretary of War, through the engineer department, which has all the information and a great deal more than Congress could have or any of its committees on this subject, to be devoted, in the language of this amendment, to the repair, the preservation, and the completion of certain public works.

I am not particularly well informed, I am very sorry to say, about these public works in detail, but I know something from the examination of the reports of the engineers, and enough to know that there are certain public works in that condition that they may be said to create an exigency, so to speak, for some appropriation. That class, I believe, is not very large.

I know that there are a certain class of public works, harbors on the western lakes, which have been prosecuted for the last three or four years, many of which are nearly in a state of completion. There are some, perhaps twelve or fifteen according to my recollection, on the western lakes, where a very small amount is proposed to be appropriated for this year, and where that small amount would complete them. I should say that the Secretary of War would find no difficulty in discriminating in favor of such works upon the obvious ground that the materials are on the spot, and that they are in that condition of completion that it would be economy to prosecute them to final completion; and therefore I should think that this word "completion" was an appropriate phrase; and that what is implied in it would be the exercise of a sound discretion.

But I know, Mr. President, more, and besides, that there are a class of public works contemplated by the bill which has been sent from the other House which do not stand in this relation to the Government of the country, which are not matters of exigency of to-day, in regard to which the commerce of the country and the general condition of the country will not suffer particularly if they are postponed until the next session; that if Congress believes that the public credit and the finances of the country will not admit of so large an expenditure at the present time, nothing will be lost particularly by allowing them to stand over until the next session, and that class is so obvious that the Secretary of War, under the information furnished him by the chief engineer, will have no difficulty, I think, in discriminating what the public service demands to-day, and between this time and the closing up of navigation in the fall, and what it does not.

Therefore, Mr. President, under all the circumstances, considering the finances of the country and its credit; considering the character of the bill which has come from the House of Representatives, the investigation that it necessarily involves, and considering the late period of the session at which it comes to us, I think on the whole the Committee on Commerce perhaps judged wisely in preferring to appropriate a general sum instead of undertaking themselves to discriminate between the classes of objects which were absolutely public exigencies and those which are not. In other words, I think that the public service will be better subserved at present by the appropriation now proposed. Unless the Senate shall come to the conclusion that it is worth while to accept the general bill as it comes from the House of Representatives, without much examination, I think it is the safer way on the whole to appropriate a general sum, such as is indicated by this amendment, and leave the matter to that discretion and judgment which we have reason to hope will be exercised in the Department of War, and postpone the further consideration of the general bill until December. Of course this ought to be done with the entire understanding, if it goes upon this bill, that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has no intention of considering at the present session the House bill, which I understand him to avow; and if it is agreeable to the Senator from Michigan, I will move as a substitute for his amendment the amendment that he had referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as modified, which was to insert after line two hundred and seven:

For the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $1,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why that particular part of the amendment is stricken out that required this money to be applied to those works which have been commenced under the authority of law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from California made some criticism upon the phraseology; he said that there were certain works proposed which had not been authorized in the sense of being appropriated for.

Mr. CONNESS. For instance, if the Senator will permit me, there have been surveys authorized under other acts; this would confine this appropriation to works that are being constructed. I do not desire any such restriction.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. "Authorized by law," when applied to these appropriations, is not a very definite phrase and has no great meaning in it, for this reason: we make appropriations for the survey, for instance, of the rivers and lakes; as the result of those surveys we get estimates for appropriations for certain improvements in the rivers and in the lakes. In a certain sense they are authorized; those improvements have been suggested under the patronage of the Government; appropriations for their exploration and survey and estimates have been made; but still they are not, in the strict sense in which we are considering this measure, considered to be authorized by law until they are appropriated for; and they are never "authorized" in any other sense. And yet a simple appropriation for an improvement at a particular place only pledges the faith of the Government that the improvement shall be made. So that, in a certain sense, I think the phrase "authorized by law" has no precise meaning, and at the same time it might exclude several works on a certain construction; there might be a distinction between a work which had been authorized by law by an appropriation to make it and a work for which there had been appropriation simply for an exploration and survey and an estimate consequent thereon. Now, I understand the Senator from California to raise such a distinction as that and say that it is invidious. That is, I suppose he means that he can conceive of an enterprise where there has been a survey, and an estimate for the improvement based on the survey, where it may be quite as important that an expenditure should be made this year as for certain other works for which an appropriation has been heretofore made. I am therefore entirely willing myself that it should stand upon the discretion of the Secretary of War to say, looking at the condition of the work for the last three or four years, "How much will it cost here to complete this improvement; how much will it cost to put that work in good order this year and ought it to be done, or can it be postponed for another year; here is a work surveyed but not begun, ought anything to be done on that?" I am willing to leave the whole matter to his discretion to this extent.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I want to understand distinctly what is proposed by this amendment. I learn privately that the proposition is to defeat the appropriation for rivers and harbors and put this in as a substitute for that general bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will pardon me for interrupting him. It has no such intention. It is simply to postpone the consideration of the river and harbor bill proper until December next; and this is for the continuation of works now in progress of construction, to carry them to the close of navigation, the close of work this year, and it makes no appropriation for next year; but that bill will be taken up early in December and perfected, and its passage urged.

Mr. HARLAN. Well, Mr. President, I was right practically. It postpones it one year practically.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; four months.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that there is this to be said about it: the appropriations which are made for the current year, commencing on the 1st of July, are usually expended the next year; there are surpluses, more or less, from the expenditures of last year. The service on these works commences at the opening of navigation on the lakes and on the rivers. Now, it is believed that this $1,000,000 will be ample for that portion of the service which is absolutely deemed to be a necessity between this and the closing of navigation, leaving the Committee on Commerce to examine the general river and harbor appropriation bill, as I understand the chairman to say is his purpose, at the commencement of the next session, in season to make the appropriations after the opening of navigation next year.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I have two objections to the proposition. The first one is, that it is unusual to place so large a sum of money at the exclusive discretion of a single officer of the Government. Heretofore Congress has been careful to provide the mode of applying the public treasure. Appropriations, to be sure, are made in gross for the support of the Army and Navy, because it is impossible to specify in advance how the money shall be applied. This proposition is, as I understand it, to place $1,000,000 at the discretion of the Secretary of War alone, to be applied on public improvements. He may apply the whole million, if he chooses, to one work; he may divide it and subdivide it just as he chooses. This is a discretion that, in my opinion, the members of Congress have no right to transfer from themselves to the head of any executive Department.

In the second place, I am not in favor of this postponement; and I will say frankly that I would deem it ungenerous for those who are interested in another class of appropriations if they should defeat the river and harbor bill in this mode. The appropriations have been made for the light-houses and for the Coast Survey and everything of that kind in which the people of the great interior have no immediate interest; and when a bill is proposed by the Representatives of the people interesting to the great interior, where they have a fair representation, this branch of Congress, where the people are not fairly themselves represented in point of numbers, proposes to postpone it for a year. If the immediate Representatives of the people are disposed to appropriate a few million dollars for the improvement of rivers and harbors, a part of the latter being in the interior of the country, I do not think this body has a right to step in and interpose. I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate in discussing this question; but I desire to record my vote against this amendment, because, as I understand it, it is intended to be a substitute for the time being for the river and harbor improvement bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say one word in reply to a remark which has fallen from my honorable friend which is not just, as I think he will admit. He wishes to protest against a discrimination here against an interest in which a certain section of the country has a deep concern, now that a certain other section of the country has been provided for. I think if the honorable Senator had paid a little attention to the progress at this session of the appropriations which have been made for the public service he would see no occasion to make that remark. The appropriations for the public defense, he knows, of course everybody conversant with the public service knows, are necessarily expended on the exterior. The ordinary annual appropriation for that is about three million dollars, sometimes more. What did the Representatives of the people who sent this bill here do? The Representatives of the people, who are supposed to represent the interest which the honorable Senator says is discriminated against here—what did they do? They sent to the Senate that bill saying, "For the public works we do nothing." Why? The exigencies of the country do not admit of it; the finances of the country do not admit of it; the credit of the country does not admit of it. What did this branch say, who do not represent the people as the honorable Senator thinks? They acquiesced. This branch of the Government said, "We recognize the fact that we are now embarrassed by a great public debt, by taxation, and by public burdens; we know that fact, and we know that in a certain other sense this nation is in the crisis of its affairs, and therefore we submit to the wisdom of the Representatives of the people, and we say that this year is not the year to do anything beyond"—what? Simply making repairs for preservation; do just enough to preserve, nothing for improvement. That is what the Representatives of the people said when this session began. Your public works, of course, must be repaired and prevented from going to waste; but beyond that the exigencies of the country do not permit you to go. That is what they said, and this branch of the Government bowed in submission to that doctrine.

Now, was that sound? I think it was. I think it was wise; I think it was prudent; and although in some sense I may be supposed to have an interest in these public defenses I have never murmured. There were only $200,000 appropriated there where it was customary to appropriate $3,000,000. During the war it was customary to do something more. But upon the specific understanding that we were to do nothing this year beyond the preservation of the public works the Committee on Commerce, to whom that bill was sent, and to whom this information was communicated, said, "We acquiesce."

Now, sir, the river and harbor bill comes here with an appropriation beyond anything that has been done at any period in our history. Never before have we appropriated $7,000,000, or anything like it, for this particular purpose. I am not complaining of that. I am not saying that all these enterprises are not worthy and should not meet your approbation. Not a bit of it, sir. Nor do the Committee on Commerce, as I understand, wish to be placed in the position of being obnoxious to the imputation that they intend to give this the go-by; but it is following out that line and that policy which was inaugurated when the session began that this year we should preserve our works; but it was not the year to extend improvements. That is all.

Now, sir, in harmony with that policy and in harmony with that principle, the Committee on Commerce propose an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the preservation and for the completion of certain public works; and I accept the proposition, as far as I am concerned. My own judgment is that a certain class of these works of very great moment to the sections in which they are—and they are all on the lakes; I do not know of a dollar of this appropriation in which I have any special interest—are in such a condition that a very small amount will complete them, and it would be waste not to do it. Therefore I am perfectly willing that that completion should be made, although it is a departure from the idea, simply because I think it would be waste not to do it. For that reason I am for it.

I submit to my honorable friend, remembering that this is the last of July, remembering that the season for the expenditure of this money is far advanced anyway, that we make the appropriations now, if we make them at all, for the current year ending June 30, 1869, which extends into the next year as well as the conclusion of this, whether, in view of what I have said, in view of what has transpired, on the whole he does not think it wise to leave this discretion where it is, in the hands of the Secretary, and with the understanding that we do so much this year as the preservation of these works requires, and postponing other appropriations to another year, when we hope to be surrounded by other circumstances when we shall be more free to act than we are at the present moment?

One word more on another point, and I am done. My honorable friend says that it is not in harmony with our usage to allow so much discretion to be given to an officer. As a general principle, I agree to that. I think that is sound. If the sum is too large for his discretion, very well; it can be limited. But, sir, this is not new. Certainly within two or three years, in 1865 or 1866, I am sure, we appropriated $500,000 in this way and left it to the discretion of the Secretary of War. No complaint ever came to my ears, certainly, that the discretion was not soundly exercised. If the honorable Senator will recollect that to the War Department, the engineer department, we are indebted for all the information and all the statistics which enable us to vote these appropriations here, he will see at once that within their reach they have the information which will enable them to judge quite as easily as the Congress of the United States could do.

Mr. HARLAN. It is due to the Senator that I should answer his question. He asked me if I thought it would not on the whole be wise to adopt this amendment, and let the river and harbor bill for the present have the go-by. I do not think so. Nor do I agree with him that we are indebted exclusively to the information that may be derived from the engineers of the Army in relation to the propriety of making appropriations for the improvement of harbors and rivers. The members of the other branch of Congress, to say the least, know more on that subject than the engineers of the Army possibly can know.

On the other point, that it will be safe probably to intrust large sums of money to the head of the Department, I have this to say: that from my personal knowledge of the present incumbent I have no doubt that he would appropriate money as wisely and as judiciously as perhaps any other person would similarly situated. But I may say, also, that if it were always true that the wisest and the best man could be selected for an autocrat, it is probable that an absolute monarchical government would be the best for the people that could be instituted; but it is because we cannot always be sure that the wisest and best men of the nation can be thus selected that we prefer a Republic. We prefer to endure the losses that may grow out of the blunders of the people for the sake of the security in the event of the selection of a bad man to rule over the nation. And so in relation to the head of the War Department. Although there is at this moment at the head of that Department a man of great learning and discretion, a man who may with great safety be trusted, with a large degree of discretion, the Senate has no assurance that he will remain in the office one day after the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress.

Nor do I think that I was sufficiently answered by the Senator when he informed the Senate that both branches of Congress had agreed to suspend the work on fortifications. Why, sir, that is the most natural thing to be done at the close of a war. Why should we proceed in the erection of forts?

Mr. MORRILL. They are simply the appropriations necessary for their continuance. No new works are proposed, of course.

Mr. HARLAN. He tells us that both branches of Congress have concurred in the policy of limiting appropriations for the fortifications to that amount which will be barely sufficient to preserve them and keep them in repair during the present year. Well, sir, while that is true, both branches of Congress have not agreed that those improvements pertaining to the civil and industrial pursuits of human life shall be suspended. The Representatives of the people in the other branch of Congress say that the appropriations that pertain to war may be limited to that small amount necessary to preserve the works, but that which is necessary to develop the industrial resources of the country shall rather be expanded than diminished. On both of these points I agree in the wisdom of the immediate representatives of the people, that while it is proper not to expend money in the erection of new forts, or even in completing those begun beyond that amount which is merely necessary to preserve them, it does not by any means follow that it is not important to improve a river, the great artery of internal commerce, on which is borne more of the commerce of the world, in value and in tonnage, than is enumerated in the reports of the external commerce of the country. Why, sir, the commerce of the Mississippi river alone far exceeds the total external commerce of this nation; and the same is true of the great lakes. I am not willing to put all these vast internal interests into the hands of any head of a Department, nor am I willing to postpone for a year the appropriations which are necessary for their development.

Mr. FOWLER. I have a single remark to make on this subject. It strikes me that this appropriation of $1,000,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War as he may think proper in repairing and completing certain public works is a most extraordinary one, indeed. Indeed I think it far more extravagant than is the appropriation bill of the House of Representatives for the improvement of rivers and harbors. By that bill certain great industrial pursuits are intended to be developed and the people's representatives have defined how much money shall be appropriated for that purpose. This amendment proposes to defeat that, to postpone it for years to come; indeed to abandon to some extent the whole system of improvement of rivers and harbors, and to appropriate $1,000,000—one-sixth of the whole sum contained in the House proposition—to be expended by the Secretary of War as he may deem proper, to be thrown away upon one, two, or three public works, as he may think best, or as those who have the greatest influence over him may induce him to do.

I was very much interested, and our people are very much interested, in the bill that came to us from the House of Representatives, inasmuch as a small sum is appropriated in that bill for the improvement of the Tennessee river. It is true that the Tennessee river has attracted but little attention and is but little known in the nation, and yet in extent it is a greater river than the Ohio. It has at least two thousand miles of navigable waters, navigable during the entire year and for the whole length with the single exception of the Muscle shoals. Several great States lie upon it and furnish a vast amount of commerce for the country. If this single improvement were made it would unlock a vast region of country and enable the people there to throw their products into the channels of commerce, which is now entirely prevented. For instance, eastern Tennessee, western North Carolina, northern Georgia, and a portion of northern Alabama, have but little access to commerce from the fact that no navigable stream reaches them except the Tennessee river, and that is so thoroughly impeded as to prevent constant commerce. A very small amount appropriated to this work would enable them to pass entirely around those obstructions. Some years ago the State of Alabama expended some three million dollars endeavoring to open up this obstruction, but their appropriations failed and the work was left unfinished. It is in a very fine state of preservation, and a small amount of money now appropriated would enable the people of that section of the country to reap the advantages of the money expended at that time; but of course it will be defeated by the operation of this amendment. Millions may be expended upon works that have already been commenced, and by the time that section of the country receives the amount of money that will be necessary for them to complete the works they have commenced, the whole system will be abandoned. This, to my mind, is nothing but the commencement of that course of proceeding.

Mr. CHANDLER. My friend from Iowa still persists in the assertion that this proposition postpones the regular appropriation bill for a year. It does nothing of the kind. As the Senator from Maine has remarked, appropriations are usually intended for the succeeding year. Some of these works have money enough already appropriated to carry them through to the close of navigation, and the Secretary of War assured me that with this $1,000,000 he could carry them all over to the close of navigation. If we take up the river and harbor bill, as it is the intention of the committee to do in December, we can make the appropriations in season for the coming year.

It is well known to every person who is accustomed to Government contracts that it is utterly impossible to commence a reasonable amount of these new works this year if we should make the appropriation. They cannot begin them. Before all the machinery of red tape, such as advertising for sealed proposals, opening the proposals, awarding and making the contracts can be gone through with, navigation will be closed, and nothing can be done until next year. This amendment simply postpones the matter for four months, nothing more and nothing less. Congress has reduced taxes over one hundred million dollars; there is a great cry for economy; and the committee, after some five or six extra sessions, after spending hours upon it, finally came to the conclusion, upon consultation with the Secretary of War and the chief engineer, to adopt this proposition to vote $1,000,000 and then take up the measure at an early hour in the December session.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Committee on Commerce have come to the conclusion they have. I am sorry they did not conclude to report a bill making appropriations for the specific works which they think ought to be prosecuted; at least making specific appropriations for those works which are already under way, to which the Government has already dedicated the public funds. I am very sorry to see any step taken which looks even like an abandonment of anything to which the Government has already put its hand. I accept readily, with entire confidence, the declaration which the honorable Senator from Michigan makes here, that this is only a partial abandonment; it is not real; that it is the postponement of something rather than a desertion of anything which is really desirable to us. But I think it would have been better, I think it would have been wiser and more satisfactory to the people, if the committee had said to them frankly, "We cannot give you all the money you ask; we cannot give you all the money which is proposed in the bill which was sent to us from the House of Representatives; we think this is not a year in which we can commence new enterprises, new works of improvement; but it is a year in which we can stand by everything which we have already commenced, and in which we can prosecute those enterprises, and therefore we appropriate so much money as we think is necessary to carry on these specific works." I should have been better satisfied, and I believe the public would have been better satisfied with a bill of that description.

But, accepting the assurance made here that it is not the purpose of the committee, and is not supposed to be the purpose of the War Office, to abandon anything already under way, I have still two criticisms to make upon this proposition. The first is that it seems to me a little extraordinary that this appropriation, all of which is to be expended in the year ending June 30, 1869, should be moved upon a bill which makes appropriations for the year already past; that it is offered upon a deficiency bill instead of a bill making appropriations for the coming year. I suppose if the money is appropriated, unless they are prohibited from carrying it forward into next year's expenditures, they can do so, and probably will do so; still I think it is an unfortunate place to tack on an appropriation for a measure of this kind.

The next criticism I have to make seems to me of more importance. I think the sum is decidedly too small. This is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War, I suppose, will be advised in reference to these expenditures by the chief of the engineer department, and I suppose the chief of the engineer department must be controlled by some idea. He has taken notes of these words; he has reports in reference to them; he has plans in reference to each one of them; estimates have been made; and the estimates upon which the House of Representatives made its appropriations came from that department. It was said here just now by the Senator from Maine that they sent us a bill appropriating between six and seven million dollars. Whether that was all called for by the chief of the department of engineers I do not know.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That includes, as I understand, about two and a half millions outside for a particular work.

Mr. HOWE. Over and above the estimates?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes; outside of any estimates.

Mr. HOWE. Then it would seem that the bill which came from the House appropriated even more, and millions more, than the chief of engineers contemplated. Then his own estimates would stand at something like $4,000,000. This is a proposition to appropriate but twenty-five per cent. of his estimates. Now, Mr. President, when a man undertakes to tell you he can cut you a coat out of two yards of cloth, he has an idea of what kind of a coat that will produce; but if you tell him to make that coat out of a yard and a half, you must not be surprised if you get a garment that does not fit you, that does not suit you at all. The chief of engineers may know, and doubtless does, how he can go to work with an appropriation of $4,000,000, and do work positively advantageous to the country; work which will not impoverish it, but make it rich.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me, in reference to his illustration, if he desired a full suit, and the tailor should say, "I can make you pants and a vest, but the coat you had better forego for a little while," that would be this case.

Mr. HOWE. That amendment is ingenious, but I cannot accept it, because it does not fit my idea. I insist upon the idea, and I think the committee have recognized it, that the engineer is going to give us a full suit.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In time.

Mr. HOWE. In time; but that he is going along with the full suit; that he is not going to turn us off with coat and vest this year, and make us go without pantaloons until the next. That is not the schedule that is submitted to us by the chairman of both these committees. I do not think that is the idea upon which the War Department would act. I think they will desire to go on, in the language of this amendment, to repair and to preserve and to complete the works already under way, the full suit.

Now, Mr. President, I think when you give to a man but a single million to go on with a work for which he asks $4,000,000, he must work awkwardly and he must work to great disadvantage. If you give him a million and a half or two million dollars, and I think $2,000,000 will be little enough to appropriate, that would carry him along through the recess of Congress, and carry him along without staggering. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I would appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce if he was within reach, if an addition to this million at least of half a million cannot be voted. Indeed, to try the sense of the Senate, I shall propose to raise this sum half a million, so as to make it a million and a half of dollars.

I will agree to everything that is said about the necessity of economy. I will second every wise effort at economy that I notice, let it come from what quarter it may; but I submit most respectfully that this is a very unfortunate point at which to commence the work of retrenchment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Being out West.

Mr. HOWE. The honorable Senator from Maine says "Being out West;" and I repeat it to the Senate. "Being out West," I am naturally, constitutionally, I suppose locally, inclined to regard it so. Why so, more than if I lived in the East?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because I notice that for everything eastern the Senator finds almost invariably that the appropriation is too much, either in whole or in part.

Mr. HOWE. Such an indictment as that I do not think is good against a general demurrer; but I do not demur to it. I plead the general issue. I call upon him to specify the instance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can do so.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; you cannot.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are the marine hospitals; you proposed to strike all those out.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine, one of the oldest Senators on this floor, taunts me with opposing marine hospitals because they are an eastern institution. Out West we have two to your one. I want to strike them all out, because they are not necessary for the public service, and the Senator knows it, and the Senate knows it. They are just as little needed in the West as in the East. They are not needed for the public service anywhere. I tell the Senator again, he cannot, with time nor with study, point his finger to a single expenditure that I have ever opposed here upon local grounds or local considerations.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I have misjudged the Senator.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator has misjudged me. I know my own record; I know my own faith; I know my own motives and theories of action; and I feel entirely confident when I challenge him to the proof of that declaration which he has made here. It is not in me. Sir, I positively do not know one single point in this whole country that I love better than another. It is not in me to love one point in this country better than another. It is not in me to know a foot of this whole country that I do not love with my whole heart, and that I will not be taxed to improve and to build up; and there is not a foot of this country where I do not hate an expenditure which is proposed for the mere purpose of benefiting that locality. I do not believe in any such local expenditure anywhere.

Mr. President, the harbors and rivers which you propose to complete with these appropriations are as essential to one part of the country as another. They are the arteries through which the blood of the nation flows. Allow them to be clogged and the circulation of the country stagnates. I say that these great water courses through which we pour the products of the West to the consumers of the East are as essential to the man who eats as to the man who raises the bread. Sir, you stop those courses; you blockade the ports which let that food out of the lakes toward the East, and the operatives of the East will be as sure to starve as the producers in the West would be to suffer. This circulation is essential, and I do not admit that I am advocating any local interest anywhere when I stand here to defend these improvements.

Mr. President, I commenced to say that I thought this was an unfortunate point, the wrong one at which to commence this work of retrenchment, for two reasons: because I think these expenditures more essential than many others you make; and for another reason: because you cannot turn back from those works without condemning yourselves. You have dedicated the nation to them; you have undertaken to build them; you have pronounced them to be essential to the public welfare, and to go back on them is to stamp your own conduct with error and stupidity. I should think that ought to be avoided if gentlemen care anything for their own consistency or for their own reputation.

But, Mr. President, we make appropriations here; we have made numberless appropriations that did not begin to compare with these in importance. Some Senator, since this debate commenced, spoke of the appropriations for the survey of the coast. Sir, you have spent about ten million dollars on that work in this country; a very essential work; I am not objecting to it. I think you have spent more than ought to have been expended. I am not sure that the work has been confined within the limits of the original conception; but you have spent these millions upon the survey of the coast, East and West. But of what possible utility is it to the country to have a survey which shall tell you where there is a shoal, which shall tell you where there is a bar, which shall tell you where there is a reef, blocking up your harbors, interfering with the navigation of your rivers, unless they are to be removed, taken out of the way. I supposed that was the object of these very surveys. The other day we appropriated more than three million dollars in one bill to meet a deficiency in the expenditures for collecting the customs. Nobody was startled at that.

I will not take up the time of the Senate to enumerate the expenditures which, although they might be required, yet I think could be better dispensed with than the amount which is actually necessary to carry those works on upon the scale on which they are now being prosecuted; and I will now conclude with moving to increase the sum from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I merely rise for the purpose of apologizing to my friend for making a side remark to him, which I did not suppose would be heard by anybody but himself, but which he seemed to take seriously, and called upon me for the proof of. If I had the proof I would not exhibit it, and I cannot give specific instances at this moment; nor do I feel disposed to follow up that matter. I feel, however, disposed to congratulate myself and the Senate that by insisting upon having the matter spoken of aloud, it gave an occasion to my friend for that burst of eloquence which he always has ready, in which "veins" and "arteries," and "streams," and "channels," as Junius says, "dance through" his speech "all the mazes of metaphorical confusion." So far the Senator has been the gainer, and so have all the rest of us been gainers.

But, sir, what I meant to say was, or what I was feeling at the time was, that it seems to me a little strange economy is only to be practiced on one side. My colleague alluded to the fact that at this session it was not thought to be expedient to do anything at all with reference to prosecuting the coast defenses. Sir, is not this Congress committed to that just as much as it is to the improvement of rivers and harbors? Is it not as essential, in one point of view at least, to the welfare of the country that the coast defenses should be put in proper shape and prosecuted, as it is that rivers should be cleared out and harbors made more accessible and more safe? Why, sir, if Congress is committed to one thing by its previous legislation, it is to the other.

But that is not the question. I am just as much in favor, and always have been, of the improvement of harbors and rivers everywhere within the means of the Government, as the Senator; and I have this advantage over some Senators at least, that my votes show always that I never inquire where any particular thing is to be done at the public expense, but only whether it is advisable; whether it is beneficial to the country. Senators from the western section or the new section of the country have very little reason to complain of a holding back of appropriations of all sorts, land and money, whenever a decent excuse for them can be found, however far West they may go. And yet my friend from Iowa tells us this morning, because the Committee on Commerce have proposed that the idea upon which we have gone through the Congress thus far should be extended to the bill for rivers and harbors, that it proves what? That after all the appropriations that are called for, for one section of the country have been made, the Senators from that section come forward and oppose the appropriations for the other. Is there any justice in that remark?

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator will allow me to remark that I did not say that they did come forward to do so, but I protested that they ought not to do so, and I hope they will not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood it as an intimidation—and how otherwise could I understand it—that this was a step in that direction.

Mr. HARLAN. It has not been tested yet. We shall know when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Commerce offer this proposition. I believe the chairman of that committee is more interested, so far as his State is concerned, than any other member of it; and yet he says he does not think it advisable to pass that bill at the present session, but deems it proper to defer action upon it for the present. Does the accusation apply to him. Sir, I do not like this kind of imputation coming from anybody whenever we begin to carry out the idea upon which gentlemen themselves have gone. Take this matter of the coast defenses. When it is a time of war we then perceive the necessity of attending to those defenses, but when it comes to a time of peace gentlemen say, "Let them stop where they are, unfinished, imperfect, useless comparatively many of them until war comes again; keep them in their unfinished state." Is that good policy? And yet that is the policy that seems to have been adopted. I made no complaint of it at the present session; and why? For the simple reason that at the present session it was thought advisable to economize in every direction, and do no more than might be thought absolutely essential to be done. We begun with that idea.

My honorable friend spoke of the appropriations for light-houses. Sir, what appropriations for light-houses have been made at this session? Has there been any appropriation for erecting new light-houses as there generally are? I believe there have been but two provided for, and those in one of the appropriation bills, and one of those I think is in California, and the other I do not know where. I succeeded in getting one into the bill for the coast of Maine, but the committee of conference would not agree to it, and it was struck out, and the others were left. So that there has been no appropriation, except simply for the purpose of keeping the light-houses in repair and in operation, in order that they may answer the purposes for which they were required—nothing more. This idea has been carried to them just as much as it has to the coast defenses, and to every other branch of the service so far as it could be carried.

Now, it so happens, although that was the full understanding, that we were to go upon that system at the present session, and defer to the next what might be necessary, at the very heel of the session comes in a bill appropriating some six or seven million dollars, and the large portion of it for new works never before heard of; for new places never before heard of, and which you cannot find the names of in any Gazetteer. I do not dispute that all these may be necessary and wise at the proper time; but I do say that it is not becoming in gentlemen under those circumstances to rise and make the intimation that, if we refuse to do that very thing, we are sectional, because it is ill-founded.

Sir, I have not examined that bill, except to cast my eye over it; and, of course, I can know nothing about the necessity of the works for which it provides; but what is proposed? In accordance with this understanding, precisely as it has been carried out, with regard to other branches of the public service, striking down, economizing, the Committee on Commerce say, "We cannot make these large appropriations at the present session, but we will make a liberal appropriation, and put it in the hands of the War Department, to do what may be necessary in order to keep our public works in repair and preservation, and to complete them, so far as it can complete them." Upon that, my friend from Wisconsin says, "I do not think it large enough." Why not? Does he give us any reason? Is it anything more than guess work? Does he tell us why; wherein? Not at all; but he would like a little more. Well, sir, I would like a good deal more than was appropriated for light-houses; I think I should like a good deal more for this purpose, if it is necessary, and I would be glad to have it this year; but what I want to call attention to is the fact that while economy has, during the session, raged upon everything else, the moment you come to touch this matter of rivers and harbors, in which my State is interested to some extent, a cry is raised at once that you cannot touch this particular thing.

Why not this as well as other things? It will take a great while before all the great rivers of this country are made perfect, and all the harbors in this country are completed. It is a question of time. Do gentlemen expect to do it at once? When we hear so much about the great West it is as well to stop and consider whether everything can be done for the great West at once. It is because of its greatness that time is required in order to do all that is necessary to be done. I cannot say it in such eloquent words as my friend has used, but I say that I fully appreciate and share with him the sentiment that we never ought to know one part of our country from another, when the question is of improvements for the general benefit; and I agree with him thoroughly that although we at the East should not starve if all these things were not done, as he seems to think we should, yet we can live a great deal better and easier from our connection with the West. We did not starve when there was not a man in the West; we made out to live. We had a hard soil, and we had a rough time of it, and expect to have in the future, but starvation did not stare us in the face; and I think even if the great West was not so great as it is, that although our comforts might be very much diminished, still we should manage to crawl upon the face of the earth living creatures.

I am very sorry, sir, that I have had occasion to say this, but it has been called out rather from my friend's insisting upon my saying out aloud what I said to him aside; and if I am mistaken with reference to my judgment of his disposition with reference to these matters I say to him that it may have arisen from the collisions I have had with him on other things; but if he says I am mistaken I apologize most distinctly for what I did say, although I did not intend it for his ear.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, there is a dash of personality entering into this debate that I do not altogether like, and yet that I am not particularly disturbed at. It requires first to be accounted for. The Senator from Maine did make a remark entirely aside, and in entire good nature, and I was responsible for calling attention to it. I called attention to it deliberately, because I wished to reply to it in as perfect good nature as the remark was made. All the feeling that I have about it, and which was not a feeling of anger at all, was evoked by the Senator subsequently rising in his place and reiterating the remark, intensified both in words and manner, and which did launch against me the direct charge of being influenced here by my jealousies and by my partialities touching localities. I do not recall the words; but that was the substance of the accusation. I replied, I could only reply by a direct denial; I could only plead the general issue, adding one thing to it: a challenge for him to produce his proof. The Senator attempted to produce his proof, and he cited one instance in which I had opposed the marine hospitals as an evidence of that local partiality and prejudice which he supposed influenced my action here as a Senator. The Senator now is disposed to waive the controversy, and I do not care anything about it. I certainly have nothing to make in pursuing that part of it. I hope he acquiesces in the truth of my statement, that I have not been actuated in this measure or in any other by any such local considerations as he attributes to me.

Mr. President, I not only have not been influenced by any such local feelings myself, but I do not remember the day, I cannot recall the unfortunate hour, when I have ever attributed any such motives as guiding the action of my fellows on this floor; and I hope—but knowing how infirm I am I make no promises for the future—I hope that day will never come to me that I shall charge the representative of a State upon this floor as being guided and controlled by an undue attachment to his constituents and love for his locality.

Mr. President, a parallel seems to be run between the appropriation asked for here for rivers and harbors and the appropriation made heretofore for works of public defense; and because the appropriations for public defense have been this year less liberal than they have been in former years, two things seem to be argued: first, that the appropriations for rivers and harbors should be proportionately curtailed; and, secondly—which seems to me much more unreasonable than that—that the West is accountable for the small appropriation for works of public defense. If the West is at all accountable for the measure of those appropriations I hear it now for the first time. As an individual I have no responsibility, for I never was consulted about the amount of those appropriation. I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will assent to the truth of that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly. I suppose the honorable Senator has no reference to me in his remarks.

Mr. HOWE. I am not replying to anything that the Senator now on the floor has said. Mr. President, I do not think the West has any responsibility for the amount which has been appropriated for works of public defense. Applying the same rule to those works that I do to these harbors and rivers, I am free to say that I know of no interest which the East has in works of public defense, necessary works of public defense, that the West has not. The East is as essential to us as the West is to the East, and the protection and defense of the East is as essential to us as it can be to any portion of the country. I have just one word of comment to make upon the appropriations for those works, and it is this: that they seem to be proposed on the idea that as much is required one year as another. When you commence the building of a harbor, an engineer can tell you very near the amount of money he will want and when the work will be completed; but when a harbor will need to be defended, I take it, it is beyond the capacity of any engineer yet educated to foretell what amount it will take to defend it. That money has been unnecessarily appropriated on those works of public defense I suppose is very probable; that money has been unnecessarily appropriated in the work of building harbors and improving rivers I shall not undertake to deny. It is inevitable; it is an incident to these kinds of public improvements that not the whole of the money dedicated should be wisely expended.

One more remark I wish to make in reply to the comments made by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] He speaks of "the great West" as if he had caught the words from me. He borrowed them from nothing I have said to-day; he borrowed them, I think, from nothing I ever said. It is a form of expression that I do not mean to indulge in, though it is a feeling, I admit, constantly with me, and it may have found utterance some time in expression. If it has I shall not apologize for it. Those words were never uttered as a taunt to any other portion of the country. They never were uttered as a boast in which I think I had any more right to indulge than any other man who loves our country. If the West is great, as I believe it is, its greatness is the common property of the whole country. Let no man be envious or jealous of it; it does no man hurt; and it does no section of the country any hurt. It is a part of the glory of the whole country, and I wish it might be the boast of the whole country.

But, sir, I did, when I was on the floor before, speak of the necessity of the commerce of the products of the West to the East, and I did say that but for them the East would starve. The Senator reminds me that the East lived very well before the West existed. That is true, but not the East of to-day lived then. The West has grown and the East has fed upon it, has thrived upon it, I am glad to know. You have an immense population, a consuming population, as well as a producing population, a population which consumes that which the West produces, and produces that which the West consumes; that you did not have in that olden time to which the Senator referred. I say the East of to-day could not survive the destruction of the West, and the West could hardly survive the destruction of the East. We are essential to each other and proportioned to each other; and I hope we may still grow with the harmony of those proportions undisturbed and unbroken. I am prepared to declare one thing for the future, that I never shall be animated by any spirit of jealousy toward any portion of my country, and least of all let me say here in conclusion shall I be animated by any spirit of jealousy against that portion of the East from which the Senator himself comes, and out of which I myself am glad to know I sprang. New England never will suffer from any deliberate act of mine, whatever other sections of the country I may unhappily touch.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as far as these sectional discussions are concerned I think they are vastly unprofitable, and I do not take any stock in them. In regard to this amendment I do not think it is consulting true economy or retrenchment. I am in favor of retrenchment, and I am in favor of economy; but is it economy or retrenchment, in the true sense of the word, to stop a public work that is of a national character, and that is essential to the commerce and trade of the country? Is there any economy in that? Is that the kind of retrenchment that the people demand? They do not demand the retrenchment of necessary expenses, but they demand the retrenchment of unnecessary expenses, of large expenditures that have been made, and which now can be dispensed with and ought to be dispensed with. But, sir, you take an improvement like that around the rapids of the Mississippi river, indispensable to a great national commerce, and you stop that improvement, or just appropriate enough to keep it in repair and not lose what you have done, and I ask you what economy there is in that? Is that retrenchment? Take the improvement around the falls of the Ohio river, which is indispensable to the commerce of four or five hundred million dollars every year, and you stop that improvement, or you say you will simply keep it in repair so as not to lose what you have done. I ask what kind of economy or retrenchment there is in that? I submit there is none. That is not the kind of economy that this nation ought to practice.

I have in my hand the river and harbor bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives. This subject has always been liable to great abuses, and I find that this bill is no exception. The trouble is in confining the appropriations to works that are really of a national character instead of being local. There are some one hundred and eighty appropriations in this little bill, and I believe it would be pretty hard work to find forty or fifty of the names on the map. At least sixty or seventy of these appropriations are for places that are not national in their character, that are purely local. Here are appropriations for harbors that you cannot find on the map, I venture to say; to build harbors where there are none, for the purpose of private speculation. But, Mr. President, it is the duty of the Senate to take up the bill and go over it, use the pruning-knife, use it boldly, cut out those appropriations that are not national in character, and make those that are national and that are demanded by the commerce, the growth and trade of the country.

I think that this amendment is not wise in itself. Even if we do not appropriate more than $1,000,000, if we cut down specific appropriations until the aggregate does not amount to more than $1,000,000, still I think the amendment is unwise and we had better make the appropriations specific in their character. You leave it to the Secretary of War, a good man, but who has much other business on hand besides designating which are the important river and harbor improvements to make. Let this matter be determined by the Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled, who come from all parts of the country and know more about this than the Secretary of War possibly can do.

Mr. COLE. It is quite evident that we shall not get through with the bill this afternoon, and I desire to have an executive session.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we had better agree first to take a recess from five o'clock to half past seven.

Mr. SUMNER. Had we not better go on with the bill a little longer, in the hope that we may finally dispose of it and then adjourn for the day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the gentleman from California withdraw his motion to enable the Senator from Kansas to submit the motion indicated by him?

Mr. COLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that at five o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until half past seven.

The motion was agreed to.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with amendments, as follows: strike out the word "and," in line three of said amendment, and insert after the word "second," in the same line, the words "and third;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: after the word "upon," in said amendment, strike out all to the end of the amendment, and insert in lieu the following words: "the examiner-in-chief oldest in length of commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

ROSCOE CONKLING,

WM. M. STEWART,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THEODORE M. POMEROY,

WM. LAWRENCE,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 344) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund duties paid on chime of bells and clock imported for St. Joseph's Cathedral, Buffalo, New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. COLE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. At five o'clock the doors were reopened, and the Senate took a recess until half past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

HENRY B. STE. MARIE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up for consideration House joint resolution No. 326.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 326) for the relief of Henry B. Ste. Marie was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of State to pay out of the civil service fund of his Department the sum of $10,000 to Henry B. Ste. Marie, for services and information in the arrest of John H. Surratt, in the kingdom of Italy, charged with the crimes of conspiracy and murder.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORY ACQUIRED FROM RUSSIA.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

Mr. SUMNER. If it gives rise to any debate I will consent that it shall go over.

Mr. CONNESS. With that understanding I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Foreign Relations proposed to amend the bill by striking out the first section, after the enacting clause, as follows:

That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the stipulations of said treaty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee also proposed to strike out the enacting clause of the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee further proposed to strike out the preamble of the bill, in the following words:

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that, in consideration of the cession by the Emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the Emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000, in coin; and whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas the subjects thus embraced in the stipulations of said treaty are among the subjects which, by the Constitution of the United States, are submitted to the power of Congress, and over which Congress has jurisdiction, and it being, for such reason, necessary that the consent of Congress should be given to the said stipulations before the same can have full force and effect; having taken into consideration the said treaty, and approving of the stipulations therein, to the end that the same may be carried into effect: Therefore.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill, as thus amended, reads:

Be it enacted, &c. That there be, and hereby is, appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $7,200,000, in coin, to fulfill stipulations contained in the sixth article of the treaty with Russia, concluded at Washington on the 30th day of March, 1867.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of Joseph McGhee Cameron, and Mary Jane Cameron, minor children of LaFayette Cameron, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 382) granting an increase of pension to Obadiah T. Plum;

A bill (S. No. 422) granting a pension to Maria Schweitzer and the children of Conrad Schweitzer, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 518) granting a pension to the widow and child of John P. Felty;

A bill (S. No. 547) granting a pension to John Sheets;

A bill (S. No. 314) for the relief of George T. Brien;

A bill (S. No. 383) granting a pension to John A. Weed and Elizabeth J. Weed, minor children of Robert T. Weed, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 517) granting a pension to the widow and children of Henry Browne;

A bill (S. No. 521) granting a pension to the children of William M. Wooten, deceased.

JOSEPH SEGAR.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Joseph Segar.

Mr. CONNESS. That will excite a great deal of debate.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator wish to debate it?

Mr. CONNESS. I do not think it a correct claim. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator wishes to debate it, I do not think I ought to call it up now.

Mr. CONNESS. I should not like to see it passed in a Senate of this size, and I hope it will not be considered now.

Mr. HOWE. If any Senator means to debate it, I do not think it right to call it up now; but if no Senator says that he wishes to debate it, I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Joseph Segar was read the second time. It provides for paying to Joseph Segar the sum of $25,000, in full satisfaction of his claim, of whatever character, for use and occupation by the United States military forces of his farm in Virginia, near Fortress Monroe, from May 24, 1861, to January 1, 1867, and also for timber cut on the farm and used by the military forces, and also for balance due him for quartermaster and subsistence supplies.

Mr. FERRY. I do not wish to see that bill pass without a division. I did not know what it was when I heard it called up first. I know something about these matters.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the bill will be postponed.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN A. NEUSTAEDTER.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to take up the bill I reported this morning from the Committee on Claims for the relief of John A. Neustaedter, a captain who served in the artillery service with General Frémont, in Missouri, and received his pay up to March, 1862, but did not for some subsequent months.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of John A. Neustaedter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Paymaster General of the Army to pay to John A. Neustaedter, late a captain of artillery, out of any money appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated for the pay of the Army, the full pay and emoluments of a captain of artillery in the Army of the United States from March 25, 1862, to August 28, 1862. There is a proviso that this act shall not be deemed a precedent for the payment of other officers holding appointment under General John C. Frémont.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will simply say that this bill provides for the pay of a captain from March until August, 1862, when the man served as such, and was then mustered out. It is the only case I believe.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to know what is the effect of the proviso.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It was inserted, I believe, at the instance of a member of the House of Representatives. I do not think it amounts to anything at all. It is mere slobber.

Mr. POMEROY. We had better strike it out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No; that will defeat the bill. It is a very small claim.

Mr. POMEROY. The idea of our saying that one act shall not operate as a precedent for another is folly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is certainly mere slobber. [Laughter.] It does not amount to anything.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARSENALS AT ST. LOUIS, ETC., MISSOURI.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia reported various amendments to the bill. The first amendment was in line eight of section one, to strike out "first;" after "Missouri;" in line nine, to insert "except the westernmost six acres thereof;" and to strike out all after line fourteen, as follows:

Second. That portion of the military reservation known as Fort Leavenworth, which lies on the east side of the Missouri river, together with that portion of said reservation situated on the west side of the Missouri river, which lies between the city limits of Leavenworth City and a line commencing on the Missouri river at the mouth of Corral ravine, and running parallel with the south line of said reservation to its western boundary.

So as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to sell, at such time and in such manner as he may deem most advantageous to the interests of the Government, subject to the provisions herein-after contained, the following military reservations and public property, namely:

The ground now occupied by the St. Louis arsenal, in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, except the westernmost six acres thereof, and that occupied by the United States arsenal situated at Liberty, Missouri, together with such buildings, machinery, and other property appertaining thereto as cannot be advantageously employed in the construction or improvement of other arsenals or military posts.

Mr. POMEROY. Why strike out the provision in relation to the Fort Leavenworth reservation? Why not sell it?

Mr. DRAKE. The reason is that there is another bill in regard to the reservation at Leavenworth.

Mr. WILSON. There is a separate bill on that subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not know anything about the other bill; I thought it a good time to sell it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, after the word "arsenal," in line two, to insert "except the westernmost six acres thereof;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the ground occupied by the St. Louis arsenal, except the westernmost six acres thereof, shall be divided into blocks and lots of convenient size for building purposes, with public streets, conforming, as near as may be without detriment to the interest of the Government in the sale, to the public streets of the city of St. Louis adjoining said grounds; a plat of this division, made in accordance with the laws of the State of Missouri, shall be filed with the proper officer in the city of St. Louis; and the said lots shall be sold separately, at public auction, to the highest bidder, after thirty days' notice by advertisement in at least three daily papers in the city of St. Louis; payment to be made one third in cash, the remainder in one and two years, with six per cent. interest per annum, secured by deed of trust on the lots sold. The stone wall surrounding said arsenal shall be sold in sections not exceeding one hundred feet in length.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, as section three:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the westernmost six acres of the tract of ground occupied by the said St. Louis arsenal, is hereby granted to the city of St. Louis, to be by it held as a public ground forever, open to the use of the public as a place of public resort, and for no other use whatever, and without any power in said city to make any disposition of the same, or any part thereof, for any private use whatever: Provided, however, That this grant is upon the express condition that the said city or the association formed and now existing in the State of Missouri for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of the late Brigadier General Nathaniel Lyon, shall, within three years after the passage of this act, complete the erection upon the said six acres of such a monument, upon a plan and of a character to be approved by the President of the United States; in default whereof this grant shall be null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines two and three of section [three] four, to strike out the words "and that part of the Fort Leavenworth reservation specified in section first;" and in lines nine, ten, eleven, and twelve to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of Fort Leavenworth reservation west of the Missouri river shall be sold in lots exceeding ten acres each, but shall be sold in lots of half an acre, separately if desired by purchasers.

So as to make it read:

SEC. [3] 4. And be it further enacted, That the grounds occupied by the Liberty arsenal shall be sold at public auction, after due notice by public advertisement of the time and place of said sale, in such parcels, blocks, and lots as may be deemed most advantageous to the interest of the Government, by the Secretary of War, upon the terms and conditions as to payment specified in the previous section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up House bill No. 485.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall go on with the regular order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit the motion to take up House bill No. 485.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether he is prepared to go on with the deficiency appropriation bill or not?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly; anxious to go on. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to give me until eight o'clock in order to enable us to pass a few bills from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If nobody else objects, I shall not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up House bill No. 485.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 485) to aid the improvement of the Des Moines and Rock Island rapids in the Mississippi river was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill provides that whenever, in the prosecution of the improvements of the Mississippi river at either the Des Moines or Rock Island rapids therein, it becomes necessary or proper to take possession of the right of way over any lands, or to use any earth, quarries, or other material lying adjacent or near to either of the works, and needful for its prosecution, the officer in charge of the work, or his assistant, may, in the name of the United States, take possession of and use the same, after having first paid, or secured to be paid, the value thereof, which may have been ascertained in the mode provided by the laws of the State wherein such property or material lie, for adjudging the value of private property which may be needed for any public improvement. When the owner of such property or material shall fix a price for the same which, in the opinion of the officer in charge, shall be reasonable, he may take the same at such price without further delay. A portion of the appropriations made or to be made for the prosecution of the improvements, not exceeding $50,000 in amount, may be applied in payment of the property or material thus taken and used.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAWAIIAN BRIG VICTORIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House resolution No. 331.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 331) to grant an American register to the Hawaiian brig Victoria was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the derelict Hawaiian brig Victoria, now owned by a citizen of San Francisco, California.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TONNAGE FEES AT CANADIAN PORTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 338.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 338) exonerating certain vessels of the United States from the payment of tonnage fees to consular agents in Canada was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter no consul or consular agent of the United States shall exact tonnage fees from any vessel of the United States touching at or near ports in Canada, on her regular voyage from one port to another within the United States, unless the consul or consular agent shall perform some official services, required by law, for such vessel when she shall thus touch at a Canadian port.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Z. M. HALL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move now to take up House joint resolution No. 341.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Z. M. Hall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion to refund to Z. M. Hall, of Chicago, the sum of $104 10, being the tonnage tax paid on the schooner S. B. Pomeroy in error by the master of the schooner, at the port of Bay City, on the 21st of April, 1868, the tax having been paid by Hall at Chicago on the 16th April, 1868.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPERTY OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 177.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It must be with the understanding that it shall not occupy time.

Mr. HARLAN. Very well.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 177) regulating the rights of property of married women in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole, the question pending being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the District of Columbia the right of any married woman to any property, personal or real, belonging to her at the time of marriage or acquired during marriage in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband to the prejudice of his creditors, shall be as absolute as if she were feme sole, and shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, nor liable for his debts; but such married woman may convey, devise, and bequeath the same, or any interest therein, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any married woman may contract, and sue and be sued in her own name, in all matters having relation to her sole and separate property in the same manner as if she were unmarried; but neither her husband nor his property shall be bound by any such contract nor liable for any recovery against her in any such suit, but judgment may be enforced by execution against her sole and separate estate in the same manner as if she were sole.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think there is any such law as that in any State of this Union; nor do I think it good policy to authorize a married woman to sell her property without the consent of her husband, although it may be hers absolutely. I think it bad policy, public and domestic, to authorize a married woman to sell her property without the consent of her husband. He cannot sell his property so as to affect her right to dower or her right in fee, as the law may be, and if he undertakes to do it her rights remain, and on his death they are in full force. In order to sell his property in which she has a right at his death she must join in the conveyance, and so when she has property in her own right, in which he has an interest to some extent or of some kind after her death, he ought to be required to be a party to the deed. But aside from that, the character of the marriage relation and the proper protection of the wife, in my judgment, require that she should not have a right to dispose of her real estate absolutely. I do not believe there is any State in the Union that grants a right of that kind.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I must interpose and call for the regular order.

Mr. HARLAN. If the vote cannot be taken immediately on this bill, of course I shall not urge its further consideration at this time. I rely on the judgment of the Senate, and am willing to take the vote. I do not wish to reply to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Kentucky desires to make some observations on the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. Then, of course, I consent that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further consideration of the bill will be postponed until to-morrow.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. WILSON. I should be obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he would allow me to call up the bill to reduce the military peace establishment of the United States. I do not ask for its consideration to-night, but simply that it may be read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 617) to reduce the military peace establishment of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill having been read,

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow at four o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour. I name that time because we stand committed to act upon another bill, and I wish to give an opportunity to allow it to be disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, is in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1841) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HOWE to the amendment proposed by Mr. CHANDLER from the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment of Mr. CHANDLER was to insert after line two hundred and seven:

For the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $1,000,000.

Mr. HOWE's amendment was to add "five hundred thousand" after "million."

Mr. CONNESS. I simply wish to say that if we are going to appropriate in this way I think the smaller sum is the best sum. I hope we shall not make the increased appropriation proposed.

Mr. HOWE. I am sorry the Senator from California feels it his duty to object to this amendment. I believe it will be satisfactory to both committees, or at least to the chairmen of both committees.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is entirely satisfactory to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE. I do not think it will be objected to by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to argue this afternoon that it was exceedingly dangerous to invest any officer with the discretionary power to expend such a large amount of money as this amendment proposes to appropriate in the improvement of rivers and harbors. I may be mistaken; it was perhaps the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] who made the argument; but I think the argument was one that is entitled to consideration. I suppose this to be a mere temporary expedient, an arrangement that has been proposed by the Committee on Commerce to enable the Secretary of War to repair, preserve, and if possible to complete certain public works; but it is not intended as an appropriation in the ordinary sense of a river and harbor bill; and if the chairman of the Committee on Commerce intends, as he has already signified, to bring forward the river and harbor bill at an early day in the next session of Congress, it seems to me that for mere temporary purposes, departing from the ordinary precedents in appropriations of this kind, it is enough to give to the Secretary of War $1,000,000 to use between this time and the beginning of the next session of Congress; and for that reason I should be unwilling to agree to this amendment.

I appreciate what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that the session is about to expire and that there is hardly sufficient time to proceed and consider in detail the river and harbor bill. I have looked over that bill, and although I of course do not possess as much information upon the subject as some other members, it seems to me that there are many objectionable features in that bill; and I should be willing to vote for the amendment proposed by the committee under all the circumstances, for that sum of money is perhaps necessary for this purpose; but if we appropriate $1,500,000, we might as well appropriate $5,000,000 and be done with it, and not trouble ourselves at the next session of Congress with the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HOWE. It does seem to me that $1,500,000 is a great deal further from $5,000,000 than it is from $1,000,000. Adding $500,000 to the sum proposed here is not so very fatal a thing as the adding of $4,000,000 would be. This only proposes an increase of $500,000 on the sum. When I proposed that it seemed to me that we had about half the year to work in, and I understood that the estimates of the engineer department amounted to between four and five million dollars; and conceding that half the year was gone, I thought that $2,000,000 would be about a fair sum to appropriate to carry them through this year. Supposing that we could save something or omit something from his estimates, and desirous to come as near the proposition of the Committee on Commerce as I could, I proposed $1,500,000. I am sorry to see this objection spring up in different quarters. I have not urged the argument attributed to me by the Senator from Oregon. I should prefer, as I said, that specific appropriations should be made to specific works; but for that there does not seem to be time, and I thought the Secretary could work nearer to his plans with $1,500,000 than he could with $1,000,000; and it does not seem to me so fatal a thing as that it needs to call up opposition, especially if that opposition is not urged by either of the committees interested in the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that the appropriation in the bill that came from the House of Representatives is between six and seven millions. Now, to cut it down to $1,500,000 is a very great reduction. I have also been informed that that sum is necessary for the proper progress and securing of the works, and I have further understood that $1,500,000 may be satisfactory to the body that passed between six and seven millions, and therefore I think, as it meets the approbation of both committees, that we had better adopt it.

Mr. COLE. I was very much in hopes that the river and harbor appropriation bill, and everything looking in that direction, would go over for this session, and I am now of the opinion that no more should be appropriated than is absolutely necessary to prevent loss on the part of the Government from the destruction of works partially completed. Now, sir, that I am on the floor, I desire to make a single remark touching a subject referred to to-day by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.]

During his remarks he alluded to improvements in the extreme West. I presume the Senator is not aware of the fact that no appropriations have been made for many years for any improvements for rivers and harbors on the Pacific coast. I have no recollection of more than a single appropriation for that purpose, made fifteen or sixteen years ago, to improve the harbor of San Diego. There is great necessity for works of that nature on the Pacific coast; but we are willing that they shall go by for this year, and we were hopeful that all other sections of the Union might look upon our present condition in the same light. It seems to me that if $1,000,000 are appropriated it will be ample to preserve works from injury during this coming year, and I hope no more than that will be appropriated at this time. I think the $500,000 called for now in addition to that ought not to be granted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 23, noes 9.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to move a verbal amendment, to which I think there will be no objection; to insert the word "extension" after the word "preservation;" so as to read "for the repair, preservation, extension, and completion of certain public works," &c. There is an instance or two where, in order to preserve the work, it may be necessary to make an extension of a breakwater, and to avoid technical objections I move the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HARLAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to state distinctly that I vote against this amendment because I wish the consideration of the river and harbor bill at this session of Congress. If there are items in that bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives that ought not to be concurred in by the Senate, as was intimated by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] in my opinion it is the duty of this body to strike them down. If there are improvements suggested there that are not national in their character and that ought to be made by the national Government, it is the duty of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to refuse appropriations for such items. But there are items of great national importance that ought not to be permitted to suffer. Why, Mr. President, it is estimated by those who are conversant with the subject, much more so than I am, that the property afloat on the Mississippi river and its tributaries in a single year would amount to $5,000,000,000. The whole commerce of the United States with foreign countries cannot exceed $900,000,000, so that the property afloat on those waters for a single year will exceed our whole external commerce quite fivefold. There are improvements on that river and its tributaries that are badly needed. We are land-locked. When commerce is obstructed on that river and its tributaries, we are compelled to resort to railroads for our communication both with the Atlantic and with the South; and whenever the price of produce advances, as it does sometimes in New York and in the eastern cities, those who control railroad capital have the means of combination by which they put up freights, so that this advance never results to the advantage of the producer in the great valley of the Mississippi river.

We submitted to this during the progress of the war; we were willing to suffer this loss; we were willing to live on our crust of bread until the battle was fought; but now that peace has come, if it is now necessary to appropriate a few million dollars to remove these obstructions the people of the country, as it seems to me, will demand it.

It is said that the river and harbor bill as it came from the House of Representatives proposes to appropriate six or seven million dollars. Well, this, Mr. President, is a mere drop in the bucket. We have it on authority that I deem reliable that the British Government have advanced and secured investments in internal improvements in her East India possessions since the beginning of our civil war amounting in the aggregate to nearly four hundred million dollars. They have done this for the purpose of opening up a great agricultural country in order that they may avail themselves of the advantage of those exhaustless resources. We have a country equally rich, a country equally productive; and if it should cost six or seven million dollars to open it up and to give us the best means of communication with the trade of the world that is available, it seems to me to be the duty of the Senate to acquiesce in the proposition of the House of Representatives and make the appropriation; but I have no doubt the amount may be with great propriety reduced very greatly. I therefore hope that every friend of the improvement of the rivers and harbors may vote against this appropriation with a view of securing action on the proper bill.

Mr. DRAKE. I am, I suppose, quite as deeply interested on account of the people whom I represent, and of their neighbors all through the valley of the Mississippi, in the improvement of the Mississippi river and other streams there as the honorable Senator from Iowa; but I am compelled to take a different course from him in regard to this matter. I am perfectly satisfied that no bill embodying appropriations for general improvements can be got through at this session of Congress. I am perfectly satisfied that those improvements will be just as well made under appropriations obtained at the next session as now. I think it is the part of wisdom to look after those improvements which have been begun, to make provision for their preservation, or for their prosecution to a point of completion, and go deliberately to work at the other bill when we come together again in December. I state this as my reason for differing from the honorable Senator from Iowa on this subject, not consenting for a moment to be thought below him or behind him in interest in the general subject of the improvement of our rivers and harbors.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object in toto to being placed in the list of enemies to river and harbor appropriations. There is not a member of the Committee on Commerce who is not an earnest friend of river and harbor appropriations. This bill came to us on the same day that a resolution to adjourn in two weeks came to us from the other House. A large proportion of the committee have spent five or six days upon the bill; and on the whole, as friends to river and harbor improvements, they have recommended this as the very best measure that they could recommend. Now, sir, I hope that every friend of river and harbor improvements will vote for this amendment, and that every enemy of river and harbor improvements will vote against it. That is what I hope and expect and believe.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, before the recess in the course of a few remarks I said that sectional discussions were vastly unimportant, and that I took no stock in them. On reflection I think I ought not to have made that remark, as it might seem disrespectful to two distinguished Senators for whom I entertain the highest respect; therefore I make this statement.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President I am somewhat astonished that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce should think that the Treasury could spare any money for the improvement of rivers and harbors. It seems to me that he is beginning to adopt a very false political economy. Why, sir, how can any money be spared from the Treasury that is flowing toward the Freedmen's Bureau? Why, sir, can rivers and harbors measure swords with the Freedmen's Bureau? Is the improvement of rivers and harbors a subject for legislative appropriation of money and to command the enterprise and the enlightened policy of the Government, when the Freedmen's Bureau and the reconstruction laws and the standing Army of the United States require every cent, and more than every cent, that can be wrung from the hard-taxed people of the United States? My honorable friend has not taken a very deep and philosophical view of this subject. If he had he never would have thought of acting with the temerity, the wastefulness, of asking a few hundred thousand dollars to improve the great rivers of the West and the harbors of the lakes and other harbors upon the Atlantic coast. It is strange that a political economist should ask Congress to appropriate money to the amount of $1,000,000 to those trivial objects, when the Freedmen's Bureau and the reconstruction laws and the standing Army that is to be maintained for another year in order to enable the southern people to be completely subjugated and to be driven from the polls at the ensuing elections, and not have the meager and hard chances that your reconstruction laws even allow them! Why, my honorable friend from Michigan I must suppose upon second sober thought will take a much sounder view on this subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the honorable Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I will say that I think that whole subject has been settled since the nomination of Blair and Seymour in New York; and I have not taken it into consideration at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, the honorable Senator is not so deliberate and so comprehensive in his surveys of such subjects as I had taken him to be. I suppose, though, that he will improve with the course of time. In this time of party activity, when the presidential canvass is looming up in all its vast proportions, and men are looking East and North and South, and they do not know what is to befall them in the fortunes of party either North or South, the idea of diverting a million of money to cleaning out rivers and harbors seems remarkable when it is necessary to appropriate a much larger sum to meet the imperative demands of the party in the Freedmen's Bureau, and the reconstruction acts, and the maintenance of the Army at its present number of some sixty thousand, capable of being filled up to one hundred and six thousand. All these demands would require vastly more money than the Treasury of the United States can stand, and it cannot be dreamed of by the honorable Senator from Michigan that the trivial subject of the improvement of rivers and harbors shall be brought into competition at all with the great national party objects to which I have adverted!

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word in regard to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky about the standing Army and the support of the reconstruction policy. The Army to day numbers fifty-three thousand men; twenty-one hundred men are stationed here in this District. In nine of the rebel States there are less than fourteen thousand, and in Texas there are fifty-four hundred, most of them on the frontiers taking care of the Indians; so that there are only nineteen thousand men in all the States lately in rebellion, and at least four or five thousand of them are used on the frontiers to take care of the Indians. The rest of the Army is stationed in other parts of the country. There are fifteen or twenty thousand in the Indian country and on the plains.

A word now in regard to the cost of the Army. It was stated here the other day that the Army cost $123,000,000 last year. To make up that amount there were included $32,000,000 paid for bounties, $9,250,000 paid to the States for balances due them on account of advances during the war, and between five and six million claims for damages on the Government growing out of the war; $2,100,000 expenses of the Freedmen's Bureau, and nearly twenty million dollars expenses of the Indian war, incurred mostly the year before, bringing the expenses of the Army last year down properly to $56,000,000.

It is estimated that this year, with the present Army, unless we have an Indian war, the expenses can be brought down to $40,000,000, and we propose to reduce the Army a few thousand men, and expect to do it before we adjourn. There are no more troops stationed in the States lately in rebellion, in proportion to their population, than would make about a fair average of the population of the United States, and it does not cost half as much to keep the troops there as it does the troops that are out on the railway lines, and especially the troops that are in Arizona, New Mexico, and that section of country where it costs so much to feed and move them.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to state that there are about two thousand of the regular Army stationed in this District; that there are about fourteen thousand in the rebel States, to use the term of the honorable Senator, and, did I understand him to say, in addition to that, about five thousand in Texas?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; I will state it exactly. There are two thousand one hundred troops stationed in this District; in the State of Virginia, the first military district, there are two thousand four hundred and ninety-seven; in the second military district, consisting of the States of North and South Carolina, two thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine; in the third military district, consisting of the States of Florida, Georgia, and Alabama, three thousand four hundred and forty-four; in the fourth military district, consisting of Arkansas and Mississippi, three thousand one hundred and fifteen; in the State of Louisiana, two thousand and twenty-two; and in the State of Texas, five thousand four hundred. Most of the troops in Texas are stationed on the frontier.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the aggregate?

Mr. WILSON. The aggregate in all the ten rebel States, including those on the frontiers of Texas, most of them beyond the habitable portions of the State, is nineteen thousand six hundred and thirteen men out of our fifty-three thousand.

Mr. DAVIS. There ought not to be the half or the fourth of that number of men in those States, in my opinion. There is no need for any honest or patriotic purpose to maintain such a force in those ten States. Those men ought to have been disbanded long ago. So in relation to the force in this District, about twenty-one hundred men, I understand the honorable Senator. It is double the number of soldiers that ought to be in this District. A thousand men to garrison the forts in the District would be the utmost that would be needed, and three fourths of the men in the southern States ought to have been withdrawn from there long ago. This army exists only for the purposes of oppression; it is not required for any just or proper object of Government. There is no disguising that proposition.

Mr. President, the policy of our republican empire is peace, not war. The object of our Government is not national strength alone, but it is liberty in the first place, and only enough strength and force to protect the country. If a proper regard to the great objects of our scheme of Government had been adhered to in the policy of the party in power, this army last year, instead of costing $96,000,000, independent of the bounties, would have cost not more than one third of that amount. I have not gone over the figures; I have not examined the documents with a view to ascertain; though the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] did some weeks since, and he presented to the Senate the figures, and showed that the cost of the Army proper last year was upward of ninety-six million dollars.

There is no necessity for any soldiers in the southern States except a few troops to garrison the different fortresses, and to take charge of them to prevent them from going to waste and dilapidation. There is no need for the maintenance of a solitary soldier in the southern States to keep the people of those States in a condition of subjection, of peace, and perfect obedience to the Government. The ground on which an army of some twenty thousand men is kept there is a mere pretext. It was a short time since much more than twenty thousand. The keeping of an army of that strength in the southern States is for no other purpose than to enslave those States to the negroes, and to enable the Freedmen's Bureau and the military satraps there to control the popular elections in those States.

Sir, I am doing what little I can to bring the attention of the country to this great abuse. It is a great abuse. The idea of a standing army in time of peace is utterly hostile and alien to our system of government. The spirit of our imperial Republic is peace. We have had peace, so far as the shock of arms is involved, for the last three years, perfect peace; and the idea of keeping up this army to consummate and complete the work of the suppression of the rebellion is altogether a pretext. If gentlemen want money, if they want the resource to raise the means to apply money to cleaning out the rivers and harbors, the resource is at hand; they have only to stretch forth their hand and seize upon it; and that is to disband one half of the Army; to withdraw the troops from the southern States; to repeal the Freedmen's Bureau. Do this, and the Treasury will have a surplus immediately of $50,000,000, and all the sums necessary to be appropriated to works of a national character, in the nature of internal improvements, will be at hand.

But, Mr. President, the play is to be completed. It is to be enacted to its last final and closing scene. We shall not see the diminution of this Army this side of the next presidential election. There may be promises, delusive promises held out to the country and to the people, that such reduction is to take place; but it is not going to take place. The Freedmen's Bureau, a corrupt piece of political machinery, will not come to a close this side of the next presidential election. It was devised for purposes of party political machinery, and it will be retained with a view to those objects, and it will be maintained until the next presidential contest is decided. Gentlemen might as well confess the truth of the case. There is no necessity for any protestations or denials to conceal the real purpose for the maintenance of the Freedmen's Bureau, the standing Army, and the enforcement of the reconstruction acts. It all resolves itself into a question of party political power and nothing else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] as amended.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelingshuysen, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Harlan, Pomeroy, Thayer, Van Winkle, and Vickers—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Buckalove, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Kellogg, McCroery, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Whyte, and Yates—26.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all laws making an appropriation for the payment of salaries of the solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor of the Court of Claims, and of the Assistant Attorney General, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the salaries of two Assistant Attorneys General, one clerk, and two clerks of class four, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, $12,400. And for the payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, in addition to the sum already appropriated, $300,000.

I will state to the Senate, if it is necessary, the reason for the first part of the amendment. We passed a law at the present session—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That amendment embraces two propositions, does it not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir. You can divide it if you wish to do so. I presume that the Senate understand the first proposition. I will state that we passed a law on the 25th of June last, the fifth section of which reads as follows:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1863, the Attorney General of the United States for the time being shall, with his assistants, attend to the prosecution and defense of all matters and suits in the Court of Claims on behalf of the United States. There shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two Assistant Attorneys General, who shall hold their offices for four years respectively, unless sooner lawfully removed, and whose salaries shall be $1,000 each per year, payable quarterly, and who shall be in lieu of the solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor of the Court of Claims, and of the Assistant Attorney General now provided for by law; and the existing offices of solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor, of the Court of Claims, and of Assistant Attorney General, are hereby abolished from and after the 1st day of July, 1863. The Attorney General shall have power to appoint two additional clerks of the fourth class, and one clerk at a salary not exceeding $2,000, in his office."

It will be perceived that this section of the law abolishes the office of Assistant Attorney General, and also the offices of solicitor, assistant solicitor, and deputy solicitor of the Court of Claims, and substitutes in their places two Assistant Attorneys General, one clerk with a salary of $2,000, and two clerks of class four, and makes it the duty of the Attorney General to attend to the business of the Court of Claims. I will state to the chairman of the committee that it reduces the expenses a little. The salaries of the solicitors were $200 more than the salaries of these officers created by this act. We passed the regular appropriation bill before we had knowledge of the fact of the passage of this law, and an appropriation was made in that bill for those solicitors of the Court of Claims, whose offices are now abolished, and also for the Assistant Attorney General, whose office is abolished. This is to pay the salaries of the new officers provided by law. The exact sum specified in the law for the salaries of these officers will be found in the amendment. That is the first part of the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The other portion of the amendment arises, also, out of the action of Congress at its present session. In an appropriation bill which passed some days ago and is now a law, $125,000 was appropriated for the payment of judgments to be rendered by the Court of Claims during the present year. The estimate was $500,000, but only $125,000 was appropriated with a limitation against the payment of more than $5,000 upon any one judgment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was not that limitation stricken out?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was subsequently stricken out, so that now the law stands as it has always stood. That was a proviso on the appropriation bill as it came from the House; but the Senate struck out that proviso, and I believe it was acquiesced in by the House; so that now we have only $125,000 appropriated to pay the judgments of the court when the estimate is $500,000. I have added here an appropriation of $300,000 to meet those judgments. The estimate is still larger than that. The Senator from Maine has the estimates before him. I offered this amendment on the other bill, but I had not given the requisite day's notice, and it was not considered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to have the question taken separately on these propositions. They are entirely distinct in their character. Let the question first be taken, if the Senator pleases, on the proposition to provide for the salaries. I ask for a division of the amendment so that that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division being called for, the question will be on the first portion of the amendment relating to the salaries of officers. The question is on that portion of the amendment.

The first branch of the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, on the other proposition I wish to suggest to the honorable Senator that although the estimates are as he supposes, yet as it seemed in the judgment of the House $125,000 was adequate for the present—

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was on the assumption that no judgment for more than $5,000 would be paid.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And if the Senator will recollect, it was upon my motion that that proviso was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I remember that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But I coupled it, also, with a motion to increase the appropriation;

but it was not in order under the rules, and was not considered. Therefore I thought it proper to bring it before the Senate now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to the Senator for his consideration, as there will undoubtedly be a reluctance on the part of the House to increase this sum, whether, after all, for present purposes, the $125,000 is not adequate. It will be recollected that the court does not sit at this season of the year. I understand that from this period until about the time we assemble again the court will not be in session, or not much, to say the least of it; it will not be doing much; and the probability is they will render but few judgments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the court meets for business in October. It meets in August, but I do not know whether it goes on with its regular business then. My impression is that it does not do much until October.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Practically it does very little until fall, so that it can hardly be expected that the judgments of the court will require an appropriation beyond the $125,000 provided for. I suggest to the Senator, therefore, whether on the whole it is not wise to let the thing stand as it does, although the estimates are larger. Undoubtedly next winter we shall be obliged to adopt the legislation he now proposes; but still, under the circumstances, I suggest to him that it may be as well to allow it to stand as it does.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would necessarily involve a deficiency and might impair the usefulness of the court. Of course it would be folly to keep up a court at an expense, I imagine, of at least $50,000 a year to pass upon claims only to the extent of $125,000. I will state further to the Senator from Maine that the appropriation last year was $700,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe it was.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a matter of public importance, I think, that there should be a reasonable sum appropriated. It is immaterial to me and to the public interests when it is appropriated, so that it is not delayed. It is for this fiscal year, and the appropriations that we shall make next session will be for the fiscal year still. This is for the current year, the year upon which we have just entered, the year ending the 30th of June next. I do not wish to take up time upon the amendment. It is manifestly a proper appropriation, and ought to be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the latter clause of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois in these words:

And for the payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, in addition to the sum already appropriated, $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I offer an amendment to insert on page 10, after line two hundred and nineteen, the following:

Navy Department:

For survey and incidental expenses connected with the care of property on Thames river, recently acquired from the State of Connecticut, $3,000.

The naval appropriation bill of last session contained the following clause:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to receive and accept a deed of gift when offered by the State of Connecticut of a tract of land, situated on Thames river, near New London, Connecticut, with a water-front of not less than one mile, to be held by the United States for naval purposes.

We received a short time ago from the Secretary of the Navy a letter containing the information that this cession of a mile of river front on the Thames river had been made and accepted, and suggesting an appropriation of $10,000 for the purposes mentioned in the amendment. I wrote to the Navy Department. I at first gave notice of an amendment appropriating $10,000; but upon making inquiry at the Navy Department I became satisfied that for present purposes an appropriation of $3,000 would be sufficient. The land is a mile front on the river by some seven hundred and fifty feet in width, and will need fencing and care, and a survey particularly.

Mr. CATTELL. I do not like to oppose the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut; but the Government have accepted of the city of Philadelphia, as a gift, League Island, for which, I think, the city paid the sum of three hundred and fifty or four hundred thousand dollars, and I have been importuned by gentlemen in Philadelphia for a survey and for some care in regard to that island. I took the ground that with the present economical disposition of the Congress of the United States appropriations in that direction would not probably be listened to with favor, and therefore I declined making such a proposition. I should be very glad if the Senate is disposed to pass this amendment that they would also make a like appropriation for a survey of League Island. The circumstances are very similar in both cases.

Mr. FERRY. I do not know that there is any necessary connection between the cession of League Island and the present cession. This cession from the State of Connecticut was invited by an act of Congress passed last year, and in pursuance of that invitation the State, at considerable expense, purchased this property and donated it to the Government. It is now the property of the Government, and needs absolutely some appropriation for the purpose of taking care of it and preventing trespasses, and making the needful external inclosures. The Secretary is also desirous, as he informs us in a letter which lies before me, of making a survey to ascertain the adaptation of this land for the purposes for which the Government invited its cession, and for the purposes for which the cession was made. I had supposed from an interview which I had with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that there was no objection on his part to the appropriation which I had offered as an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say one word in explanation. This amendment did not come to the committee in season to be presented by the Committee on Appropriations, but my attention was called to it by the Senator. Notice had been given to the committee so as to enable him to move it, and on a statement of the facts, and considering the moderation of the appropriation, it did not seem to me that I could very successfully oppose it. So he was right in inferring that it seemed to be proper enough.

Mr. ANTHONY. The difference between the two cases is that League Island does not need fencing, and this ground that has been accepted by the Government at New London does need fencing. There is no fencing necessary for League Island, and I suppose it could not be fenced unless you got poles fifty feet long on account of the mud there. Otherwise it would be impossible for them to remain. [Laughter.]

Mr. CATTELL. The only reply I have to make to the Senator from Rhode Island is that the State of Connecticut ought to have presented the land already fenced. I do not think they ought to have subjected the Government of the United States to the expense of fencing it. I will say further that League Island is occupied by the Government of the United States. I saw there last winter twelve or fifteen iron-clads in the back channel of League Island, and it strikes me that if there is to be an appropriation for one of these places they ought to be put on a par. Certainly if we do not need fencing at League Island we want a survey. If we could have an appropriation for a survey, perhaps my friend from Rhode Island would be able to ascertain definitely what the depth of mud is at the island without being obliged to guess at it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. There are not so many iron-clads there as there were, for one took fire about a year and a half ago, and there was not water enough there to put it out. [Laughter.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I have two amendments to offer from the Committee on Commerce. The first is to insert after line two hundred and eight, on the ninth page, the following:

One hundred thousand dollars, or so much of the same as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in the removal of the wreck of the iron steamship Scotland, now on the bar outside of Sandy Hook, near the entrance to the harbor of New York: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall, after notice given in one or more newspapers in the cities of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, receive sealed proposals for the removal of said wreck, and make contracts for the same with the lowest bidder therefor. Said contract will in no case exceed in amount the sum herein appropriated.

In January, 1867, Congress passed an appropriation of $100,000 for this purpose, but on representation being made that the owners of the ship had made a contract with a wrecking company it was thought best to repeal that law, and the law was repealed. The wrecking company have been at work for a year and a half, and have accomplished nothing. One hundred thousand dollars is the least sum for which this obstruction can be removed, and it is supposed that this appropriation, as it is limited, may be the means of getting the ship removed; otherwise it will cost more.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator whether this is the same proposition which was before the Senate last year?

Mr. MORGAN. Precisely the same. It is a copy of the law that was repealed. I have it before me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That law was repealed?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I have another amendment to offer reported from the Committee on Commerce, to insert after line two hundred and eight, on the ninth page, the following:

For the removal of a sunken rock in the channel of the harbor at the port of New York, $1,530.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. I offer an amendment to insert after line seven, on page 1, the following:

For pay of additional messengers of the Senate for the month of June, 1868, $2,245 04.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer an amendment from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to insert after line three hundred and forty-eight on page 15, the following:

For deficiencies in appropriation for feeding destitute friendly Indians under act of July 20, 1867, in accordance with the recommendation of the Indian peace commission, $172,827 11.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to have some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] has been unwell during the day, and not able to come into the Senate, and in consequence of that I have offered this amendment in behalf of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator whether a corresponding one was not offered and adopted to the Indian appropriation bill recently passed?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is for a deficiency; the appropriation bill is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

Mr. CONNESS. It was stated in the discussion that the appropriation was made for a deficiency for feeding the Navajo Indians.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This has nothing to do with the Navajos.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, this is to feed other Indians.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; to feed other Indians. My honorable friend will remember that General Sherman, Mr. HENDERSON, and others went out to deal with the Sioux and the Indians on the plains who were at war, and make peace with them and feed them.

Mr. STEWART. From what time to what time was the feeding done?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The deficiency is $172,827 11. The Secretary states:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 15, 1868.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication of this date from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, reporting a deficiency in the appropriation made for the subsistence of friendly Indians amounting to $172,827 11, and invite the attention of Congress to the favorable consideration of the recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the above amount be appropriated to enable the Department to pay the indebtedness to contractors and special agents as indicated by that officer.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the letter of the Indian superintendent read, and hear what he says.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have here the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject.

Mr. CONNESS. Will not the Senator send it up to the desk and have it read by the Clerk?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
July 14, 1868.

SIR: Referring to the matter of the subsistence of friendly Indians, and to the appropriation of $300,000, made last year for that purpose, I have to say that in each of the contracts made by this bureau for supplies for such Indians there was a clause to the effect that the contractor should continue furnishing supplies for thirty days after receiving notice to cease the delivery.

Timely notice was given to the contractors to stop furnishing supplies; but, owing in a great measure to the great distance and isolated location of the points where the subsistence was being issued to the Indians the agents of the contractors continued delivering and the special agents of the Department continued receiving supplies, until the cost thereof, together with the cost of articles furnished by various parties under orders of the Indian peace commission, and the expenses incident to the delivery of the subsistence to the Indians, largely exceeded the amount of the appropriation.

There are vouchers now in this office in favor of Thomas A. Osborn for supplies furnished under his contract to the amount of $31,042 93, and in favor of Lewis Stettauer for supplies furnished to about fifty-four hundred and seventy-nine Indians in February, March, April, and May last, to the amount of $66,981 65. Total, $98,024 58.

I am also advised that there are vouchers not yet presented for payment in favor of Mr. Osborn to the amount of about $69,802 53 for supplies furnished during the month of May last to about fourteen thousand Indians. This will make about the sum of $167,827 11 due and owing to Messrs. Osborn and Stettauer under their contracts.

In addition to this there will be required for salaries of the special agents, and to pay their necessary expenses the further sum of $5,000, making in all a deficiency of $172,827 11 in the appropriation for subsistence of friendly Indians.

I respectfully request that this matter be laid before Congress, with an urgent recommendation that the sum of $172,827 11 be appropriated to enable the Department to settle up this indebtedness and to pay the balances due the special agents.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CONNESS. It appears to me, on the reading of that letter, that the first thing to do here is to refuse the appropriation, if we have any regard for the public service or the public money; and the next thing should be to dismiss the Commissioner from office. After that, in due time we might investigate those vouchers, and ascertain what part of them were authorized by law or ever had a reasonable appearance of equity connected with them. This statement of an official that we appoint to a high office, one of the most responsible in this Government, in point of the amount of money involved, is the most disgracefully loose one I have ever listened to. He says that Congress made an appropriation of $300,000 to subsidize Indians, and that the Department, in accordance with their duty in the premises, made contracts with certain parties to furnish supplies to them, putting conditions in those contracts that the parties supplying should cease those supplies one month after notice was served upon them, but, very conveniently to the persons thus supplying, they did not receive the notice. The wonder is that they ever received the notice. It is said that during Tyler's administration a certain official holding a mission in one of the South American republics, I believe—he has gone now to Heaven,

I hope, consequently I do not name him—was recalled; but the letter of recall could not find him; and I do not know how many years it was in finding him. He did not turn up anywhere so that it could look at him.

Here, in this case, the $300,000 sacredly placed with a high public official in one of the departments of this Government was not only expended, but these contractors were allowed to go on and create additional obligations, or go on and make money ad libitum; and we are told coolly by an official here, in a communication addressed to a Department, and now coming to Congress, that this constitutes a deficiency in appropriations.

Mr. President, we hear it stated here sometimes, and especially by my friend from Kentucky, who appears to have a Democratic nightmare, the animal that he is approached by and in such terror of being a Freedmen's Bureau, that we are cursed with military administration in this land. Notwithstanding the oppression to my honorable friend I would have a little more of it. We want some kind of administration by which some of these high officials shall be taken out and publicly executed. Let one man engaged in perpetrating these gross frauds against the public weal and interest, and thus lowering the whole standard of public morals, thus destroying the faith of the people in every official agent of the Government, be suddenly and promptly put to death, and we would have an end to it.

I have had some little acquaintance with the public business, and I never heard such a statement as this before. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are called for, and the merest pretense put in here to justify its payment. Why was not this information sent in at an earlier period of the session and examined by the proper committee? Why were not those vouchers called for? Shall we, in addition to the vouchers spoken of, appropriate money to pay for the guesses of the commissioner that he is informed that there are other vouchers, amounting to $60,000 yet to come in? I hope this body will not appropriate a dollar to make payment for such charges against the public Treasury.

We hear very much of the peace commission. While the peace commission are going on doing their business, as we are frequently told, and with some truth, making a more economical administration by the use of money than by the use of arms, there are other commissioners in the shape of contractors who have their arms in the Treasury to the shoulder, pulling out the public money. When the bottom of the purse is reached they call for more, and it is a matter of course, for is it not a deficiency?

Mr. WILSON. It is called a deficiency.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes; it is a deficiency. It would be a wonder if there was not a deficiency in the bag from which they pull. I do not know when it will be otherwise. I have a belief that it might be otherwise; and we all know that it should be otherwise. This letter is the most curious official production, I will guarantee, that has ever yet seen the light. If there is one Government on the face of the earth, or was one even when King Theodorus was in operation, that would permit that class of administration, I should like to know where it is and what people can stand it. Surely, sir, we are a patient, forbearing, and ever-and-ever enduring people.

Now, sir, I hope this appropriation will not be made, and that these things will not be called deficiencies.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say a few words on this subject. The Secretary of the Interior sends in this recommendation, making his statement. So far as I know, the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior has never been questioned by any human being. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs (Mr. Taylor) sends in a letter making a statement of the facts. I may not know as much of that gentleman, but I never heard Mr. Taylor's character for integrity questioned in any place or by any person. I believe him to be a man of honor, a man of truth, a man of good character, which he has borne in the State where he lived and has borne here at Washington. I believe that the honorable Senator from California is entirely misled in his view of the case.

I regret that the honorable Senator from Missouri, who was himself one of the peace commission, is not in his place. Mr. Taylor, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, was another of that commission. General Sherman, I believe, was another. General Sanborn was another. I cannot state the names of them all. But it will be remembered that when this commission started to go out upon the plains to make peace with the Indian tribes, with whom we were then at war, Congress made an appropriation of $300,000 to enable the friendly Indians to be fed and taken care of. We were at war with from ten to fifteen thousand Indians—the Sioux, the Arapahoes, the Cheyennes, and the Kiowas, on both lines of the railroad, across the plains, up the Smoky Hill, and up the Platte. Sir, at this very hour there are fifteen thousand troops stationed upon those two railroad lines, costing this Government $20,000,000 a year; and when this peace commission went upon the plain, they were at war with all those Indians, from the British possessions south and below the Arkansas river. What did the peace commission go for? They went to make peace with the Indian tribes, and Congress put at their disposal $300,000. They went out among the Indians; they have made treaties of peace; they have made peace with those Indians; and the war is not now going on at all. In the course of their operations it was impossible for them to know in advance, for Congress to know in advance, for the Department to know in advance, how large supplies would have to be furnished to these Indians, and they overran this appropriation of $300,000 by $172,000, as the commissioner states. That is all there is of it.

I regret that the Senator from Missouri is not here, because he was one of the peace commissioners, to explain the matter, because he was on the ground personally. I only know of it from report. I believe that that peace commission was perfectly honorable. I believe they have accomplished a great good in making peace with those Indians. I believe they have saved millions upon millions of dollars to the Government. I have no doubt they have saved $20,000,000 by going out there. And yet here were these expenses that they were subjected to, Mr. Taylor himself being one of that commission, and General Sherman and Mr. HENDERSON, and others acting together. It is impossible to make any treaties with Indians, and to get them together to talk with them, without having some supplies furnished, and those supplies had to be furnished at far distant points, and points distant from each other, near Fort Laramie, near some of the other forts, all the way on the plains between Powder river and Fort McPherson and Salt Lake, through that whole region of country. Medicine Lodge river, where they met a good many Indians and formed treaties, is away down below the Arkansas, if I am correctly informed as to the geography of the country, and then they had to have supplies away up by Fort Laramie.

Now, Mr. President, just look at this. Here are fifteen thousand troops; here is the expenditure of $24,000,000 to feed those troops; but when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] comes in here with a military bill, or the Committee on Appropriations with their bills for supplying deficiencies in paying the troops, who gets up here in the Senate and demands the vouchers? Where is the man that gets up here and says, "If every voucher is not presented, not a deficiency shall be paid in the War Department?" You never hear anything of that sort about those appropriations. It is because they are for the War Department, that Department which swallows and ingulfs by millions upon millions at a single appropriation without inquiry and without question. But here comes another Department and says, "We have made peace with the Indians; to do so we have overrun our appropriation by $172,000 to feed these friendly Indians; we ask it to be appropriated because the Department has run in debt to that amount;" and lo! and behold there is a great demonstration. It is something about Indians. It must be a fraud, of course. You may spend $24,000,000 in fighting the Indians; you may have all the contractors from here to Kansas employed in carrying supplies to your fifteen thousand troops, and it is all right.

Mr. STEWART. They never fight the Indians.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator says the troops never fight the Indians. I agree that the troops are not of much consequence in fighting Indians. I would rather send out a peace commission with a few boxes of tobacco and a few presents; and on my life, I believe if you will withdraw every soldier from the plains, and stop the expenditure of every dollar in the support of your Indians there, and appoint six good old Quakers, whom I could find in the United States, and give them $500,000, they would keep the peace with the Indians better than the whole of your Army.

Now, Mr. President, when this appropriation comes from the Interior Department, asking for this deficiency, I know of no reason why there should be an outcry against it any more than if it was asked for by the War Department. The War Department furnished food to the Indians sometimes from the commissary stores, and they report to Congress, "We have drawn on our commissary stores to feed Indians; we want you to supply the deficiency," and you pass a bill in five minutes. You do not ask for vouchers. You do not ask the Secretary of War to come down here with his books and all his vouchers in his hands to demonstrate and prove to you that every pound of corn and every pound of meat has been delivered. But if the Secretary of the Interior comes and tells you that he has overdrawn the appropriation, then anything connected with Indian affairs must be a fraud of course.

Mr. President, let us deal fairly with honorable men. I believe Mr. Browning and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are honorable men, as I believe all the gentlemen connected with that peace commission are; and I believe that they have saved to the Government millions upon millions of dollars, besides saving us from war.

Mr. STEWART. I do not expect to beat an appropriation with which the word "Indian" is connected. I never have succeeded in doing so, and do not expect that I can do so now. But I fully concur with the Senator from California when he denounces this letter as the most frivolous evidence ever presented upon which an appropriation was demanded. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs tells Congress that he made a contract whereby the contractors could go on for a month after receiving notice, an indefinite contract for an indefinite time. He then tells us that they went on, and he could not get the notice to them. Further, he tells us that he is getting in some of these accounts, and he expects more. We have $20,000 appropriated every year for the Indians in Nevada, and we have about as many Indians there as they have anywhere else, but we never supposed that we could go on and spend two or three hundred thousand dollars and call it a deficiency. Is there no limitation? Is it entirely discretionary? Has the Commissioner a right to contract all he pleases and render the Government responsible? I supposed he was to use the money appropriated. If there is no limit there is no use in appropriating money. We might as well appropriate it in gross if he has unlimited power and unlimited discretion to spend as much money as he pleases for Indians or for Indian contractors.

Mr. President, the management of our Indian affairs is the great leak of this Government.

"It is true you spend twenty-five or thirty millions to keep an army among the Indians when there is no necessity for an army in many portions of the country. You can generally get volunteers to do the duty whenever you want to fight on two hours' notice, to a great deal better advantage than hauling your Army over those plains and feeding them from year to year. You do not want money for any soldiers. You can get volunteers to do the work at the time it is needed. You do not want an Indian department working at cross purposes with the Army, and each accusing the other, and each charging the other with all blame of mishaps. The whole system is a system of mishaps, mischance, troubles, turmoils, and enormous expense. I can get abundant testimony from the Army that the peace establishment is corrupt, imbecile, and interferes with their arrangements. I can go to the peace establishment and pile up the evidence mountain high against the Army. The whole thing is at cross-purposes. There is no system, and it appears there is no responsibility. There is an unlimited discretion in the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. When $300,000 has been appropriated and expended, he deliberately allows the contractors, for want of notice, to go on and involve the country in a debt of $170,000; and without sending even the vouchers to a committee he tells Congress that he has contracted a debt of that amount, and calls it a deficiency!"

These deficiencies above what is appropriated for a specific purpose, where the commissioner has no discretion, no authority, to bind this Government, ought to be disregarded. The Department ought to be held to the amount appropriated. They come often enough for appropriations and get large enough appropriations, and reasonably expended they should not want any more.

The Senator says that Mr. Browning has recommended it. I do not desire to question the honesty of Mr. Browning, but I do not think he is one of the most reliable managers of Indian affairs. There is a report from the Committee on the Judiciary with regard to one of his transactions which shows a loose mode of doing business which we should stop. When you had an Indian commissioner, after the appointment of Mr. Taylor, he gave a license or an authority to Bogy to purchase a year's supplies, to go on ad libitum. The Committee on the Judiciary found that there was no law for it; it was done without authority of law; and so I say the indorsement of Mr. Browning to this does not give it much of credit. It was done without authority of law, and I believe in holding the Indian department to the administration of the law and holding them in the appointment of agents to the law. I would not appropriate a dollar to pay one of the contracts made by Mr. Bogy if I knew it, because Mr. Browning had no authority to appoint him. Hold them to some responsibility if there is to be any responsibility connected with Indian affairs.

But the Senator says we do not inquire into the War Department. It is true we do not; but there they have got the matter systematized; they have rules and regulations; they have machinery whereby these things are investigated. In this case the Commissioner of Indian Affairs tells us so many accounts have reached here, more than he expected, and there is a deficiency, because he has heard by letter of some other accounts that are coming, accounts that were contracted without authority of law.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not know the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I am not his assailant; I am not his defender; but I agree with the Senator from California that a permission that a contract amounting in the aggregate to $300,000 should run on until it had consumed some one hundred and seventy thousand dollars more for the want of a notice of the termination of the contract, or that the contract should not continue any longer, deserves and requires an explanation. I have heard from every source that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is an honest man; I have no reason to believe the contrary; but I agree with the Senator from California that this matter has been presented rather loosely and generally to the consideration of the Senate; and I think it deserves more precise and particular explanation.

The honorable Senator from California remarked that I had a great aversion to the Freedmen's Bureau. I have a greater aversion to another thing, and that is a public plunderer. I have no doubt, the mind of the people of this nation does not doubt, that a very large portion of the public debt has resulted from public plunder and public plunderers. When I see an officer of the Government who has but a moderate salary or moderate compensation getting suddenly rich, living sumptuously, expending his thousands in building fine houses, sporting fine equipages, and the indulgences of his family; when I see public contractors running their career and coming out of large contracts suddenly rich, I have no other conclusion than that in both those classes of cases there has been public plunder.

I am pleased to see the honorable Senator from California, or any other Senator, interposing for the purpose of having public plunder and public plunderers unveiled. He will never meet with any obstruction from me. Sir, if all public plunderers in this land who have amassed such sudden and princely estates could be marched out in the sunrise in the public road and be made to disgorge the vast amounts which they have stolen and plundered from the Treasury of their country, I would promote all I could such an operation. I care not who they are, whether in the Senate Chamber, in the Executive Departments, in the Army, or anywhere else; whenever you can strike the lead of a public plunderer, follow it closely and vigilantly and unveil him, and, if you can, make him disgorge, hold him up to the scorn and the reprobation of the nation and of the people.

Sir, we have had vastly too much of public plunder and vastly too many public plunderers; and ever since I have had any knowledge of our Indian affairs the whole of our Indian relations have been reeking and rotten with plunder. It is not the exception; it is the rule. Corruption in our Indian transactions is the rule. Corruption in our Army contracts has become almost a rule. Corruption in public office, civil and military, in public contracts and public jobs, has become the rule. It is time that the veil which has so long concealed this festering, enormous, expanded and expanding public plunder and public plundering should be torn aside. I tell the honorable Senator from California that, abhorrent as to me the Freedmen's Bureau is, the public plunderer is still more so. And whenever the honorable Senator interposes in relation to the supplying of the Indians, for which this deficiency has made its appearance, or in any other way, let him get upon the lead of any public plunderer and he will find that as far as I can sustain him he shall be sustained.

In making these remarks I say nothing to inculpate the Commissioner of Indian Affairs except this: that the matter upon which he asks the appropriation of this large deficiency of $170,000 to supply the overrunning of a contract does require and ought to receive at his hands a careful and precise and truthful and clear explanation.

I rose merely to inform the honorable Senator from California that there were subjects on which I held a much deeper detestation than I do of the Freedmen's Bureau, and among them is public plunder.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STEWART called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say a word or two before the vote is taken. About this particular proposition I have very little information; but upon the general subject out of which it grows I have some distinct recollection, and I do not think from the recollection I have of the general subject that this general tone of denunciation and the cry of corruption has much application to this particular matter in hand.

I have not raised the question of the rules upon this proposition to amend, because I thought the Senator who offered it from the Committee on Indian Affairs ought to have an opportunity to explain it and the Senate ought to understand it; and I do not yield to the cry that it is to be presumed and taken for granted that it ought to be voted down. It ought to be considered fairly. That is my belief about it.

Now, sir, what is the general fact? Those who were here at the extraordinary session in July last will remember that we were told an Indian war was not only imminent, but inevitable. It was said that it was begun, and ten regiments of troops were demanded for the prosecution of an Indian war then upon us. That is fresh in the recollection of all of us, is it not? We were then smarting under the memory of an Indian war in 1861 and 1865, originating in our own usurpations, in our own wrongs, as a committee of our own body told us upon the fairest evidence they got, which had cost us $45,000,000, and resulted, I believe, in the grand total of some few scalps, not to exceed fifty in all; and it was said that another war of like kind was inevitable, and that there was no policy which could be adopted short of the absolute extermination of the Indians which would give security on the borders.

What did Congress do? It resisted the clamor; it declined to appropriate a dollar for men and for war; but instead of that provided for a peace commission, put the Lieutenant General of the Army instead of at the head of his troops at the head of that commission, and sent them into that country with an appropriation of $300,000 to gather these warlike bands and tribes wherever they could be found, who were willing to treat, to come together and confer with the Lieutenant General of the Army on the subject of peace and submission to the authority of the Government of the United States. They were gathered by thousands and tens of thousands. Some thirty thousand of these Indians have been gathered first and last, and have entered into treaty stipulations and friendly relations with the Government of the United States through the agency of this peace commission. War was averted. Nobody will doubt that. War was averted through this instrumentality. That appropriation of $300,000 and the peace commission, which was inaugurated here in July last, averted an Indian war. Nobody the least acquainted with public affairs will deny that general fact.

What did we save? Saying nothing of the barbarities and cruelties that attend an Indian war, we have saved millions and millions of treasure, and we have incurred a debt of $170,000, which we are now talking about. We have been involved in an expenditure of $300,000, appropriated and put into the hands of the peace commission to feed the Indians, the result of which is peace, the result of which is general conciliation and treaty stipulations with the Indians by which they agree to abandon their habits, provided we keep our faith with them; and it is said as a result of this policy, growing out of it, and going up beyond the $300,000, we have incurred a deficiency to the extent of this item.

Now, sir, I submit, if that is so, and I have very good reason to believe it is so, it is a mere bagatelle. When the Lieutenant General of the Army, who had heretofore believed that war was the only remedy the nation had against these tribes, went on to the plains with this peace proposition, with the $300,000, to conciliate these people, and to feed them and treat them as friends, he returned, at the commencement of this session, and said he himself had become a convert to a different policy.

Mr. CONNESS. Not this kind of business. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not speaking now of this particular proposition. I am only speaking of the general result, which may or may not, as the Senate shall think, include this deficiency. If it does not, then it ought not to be paid. But, sir, the Lieutenant General of the Army told me he had changed his entire opinions upon this subject; that he could do more by trifling sums—a few thousand dollars, or a few hundred thousand, if you please—in the way of food and presents to these Indians, and kind treatment, than with all the Army that could be brought into the field against them.

If that peace commission is prosecuted in the spirit in which it has been begun, if General Sherman is sustained by suitable appropriations, if you will make even decent appropriations, a few hundred thousand dollars appropriated to General Sherman to conduct these peace negotiations, where you are appropriating millions to support the Army on the frontier—and you have not less than fifteen thousand troops now on the frontier at an expense of at least a million and a half a year for each regiment—I say, if you will do this, within a very few years you will have no occasion, in my judgment, to maintain a military force on the frontier. These roaming bands will be collected on to reservations which are now being provided under the policy of this commission. They will be gathered into these general reservations and a government established over them subjecting them to the laws of the country and protecting them, giving the protection of the Constitution and the laws to them, which will enable you to dispense with all your treaty stipulations and all your annuities, and govern these people as a people with respect to their rights.

I felt called upon to say this much because this deficiency grows out of this general transaction; and there is nothing more natural in the world than that having appropriated $300,000 in July last, considering what this peace commission has done, there should be this deficiency. It is not necessary to resort to the inference of corruption either in the Commissioner or anybody else, I submit to my honorable friend from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not intimated anything of the sort.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I misunderstood the honorable Senator. He was talking so loud about corruption in some direction that I did not know but it was in this quarter.

Mr. DAVIS. I stated expressly that I had no reason to believe there was anything wrong in relation to this matter. I will say one word further, with the permission of the honorable Senator. This peace policy, which aims at feeding instead of fighting the Indians, is, I think, the wisest policy the Government ever adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very glad the honorable Senator concurs in that view. I believe the honorable Senator voted for it.

Mr. DAVIS. To be sure I did.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter which explains something about it and perhaps may throw some light on this transaction. It seems that after the appropriation had been made of $300,000 to aid the peace commissioners, they went into the Indian country. It seems that a contract was made with certain parties to feed these Indians.

Mr. CONNESS. Who are they?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I only know from what I see here, Messrs Stettauer and Osborn: this is a document "relative to furnishing supplies to destitute friendly Indians." That was the general business in which by their contract they were engaged. They were employed to feed these friendly Indians while the peace commissioners were treating with them. By the terms of the contract, these parties were to have thirty days' notice to cease furnishing the supplies, because they were in the Indian country and it would not be a fair thing to them to give them abrupt notice to cut off supplies. Their contract provided for thirty days' notice. It seems as early as April last these parties were notified.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will read the document before him if it relates to the case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps that is the best way:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 24, 1868.

SIR: Herewith I transmit a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 23d instant, inclosing to this Department the accompanying copies of letters from Messrs. Stettauer and Osborn, relative to furnishing supplies to destitute friendly Indians.

Under the circumstances, I have the honor to invite the immediate consideration of Congress to the subject, and would respectfully suggest that if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs' recommendation meets with the approval of Congress, a resolution may be passed without delay authorizing the Department to take the necessary steps to provide for the present urgent necessities of the Indians in advance of an appropriation.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. H. BROWNING, Secretary.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Now, I will read the letter of the Commissioner, which is dated on the day before:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copies of letters received from Messrs. Louis Stettauer and Thomas A. Osborn, dated yesterday and to-day, respectively, both in answer to office letters, notifying them to cease furnishing supplies under their contracts made with this bureau on the 12th of November, 1867, for friendly Indians at and near Fort Cobb, in the Indian territory, at and near the Big Bend of the Arkansas river, in Kansas, and at and near North Platte City, in Nebraska.

It will be seen that both parties offer to continue furnishing the necessary subsistence upon the terms mentioned in their respective contracts, if it is the opinion of the Department and of this office that Congress will make appropriations for the purpose.

Not being sufficiently advised respecting the intention of Congress in regard to appropriating funds to continue the feeding of such friendly Indians as may require assistance to respond to the offers made by said parties the matter is respectfully referred to your consideration, and for such instructions in the premises as may be deemed necessary.

I would suggest in this connection whether it would not be advisable, before responding to Messrs. Stettauer and Osborn, to ascertain, if possible, the views of the members of the Indian Committee in each branch of Congress regarding the probability of an appropriation being made to feed the Indians in question.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner.
Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

Then follow the letters upon which these two letters are based. This goes to show that as early as April last, while these men were furnishing supplies to the friendly Indians under this contract, they brought the subject to the attention of the Department that these supplies were running out, and that fact was communicated by the Department to Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like, if it will not disturb the Senator, to ask him the date of the appropriation of $300,000?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That was last July.

Mr. CONNESS. July, 1867?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is my recollection.

Mr. CONNESS. And these letters are dated in April, 1868.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems that the $300,000 was running out, and the Department gave these parties notice as early as April that they must cease furnishing supplies unless Congress should make a further appropriation. Now it is said—and that is a fact that I suppose the Committee on Indian Affairs have examined; the honorable Senator from Wisconsin says he presents this amendment from that committee—that this amount absolutely was expended beyond the $300,000 in feeding the friendly Indians with whom our commissioners were negotiating for the general purpose of keeping the peace. If that is so this is an honest transaction; then this money is to be paid; then it is a deficiency in pursuance of a policy which we established, in pursuance of a policy which was wise and sound, which did avert a general war, and which no man will doubt saved to the Treasury of the United States a great many millions of money. But whether this is precisely what it purports to be I do not know, for I have not audited it; I do not know that the Committee on Indian Affairs have audited it; and therefore it seems to me that the Senate must either reject it on the general grounds I have stated, or they must accept it upon these general grounds, putting some confidence in the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

This deficiency has resulted in this way, and the presumption of fraud does not necessarily arise on this record. If that is so the claim is a proper one, and under such circumstances I submit to the Senate whether they think I ought to raise the question of order against the Senator who moves this from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to state that when the bill was before the Senate last July for the establishment of the peace commission, the Indian Committee of the Senate, after having given the question a very thorough consideration, asked for $500,000, believing that to be the lowest sum with which this policy could be entered upon. It was cut down to $300,000. We then anticipated that there would be a deficiency. It has come.

One other fact I desire to state. The General of the Army, in his estimates this present session for the next fiscal year, reduced his estimates for the expenses of the Army about fifteen million dollars from the previous year as the result of the cessation of an Indian war.

Here are these two facts in contrast: peace with the expenditure of $500,000, or an Indian war raging all over the Indian territory at an additional cost of $15,000,000. Senators can take their choice.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand the mode of discussion pursued by both the honorable Senators last up. When I rose and submitted the remarks that I did it was on the official document read at the Clerk's desk; it was upon the official statement made by the head of a bureau; and I addressed myself especially to the loose and extraordinary manner in which this so-called deficiency was created. To that there is made answer that Indian wars involving sums guessed at by the twenty or forty millions at the time were averted by the Indian peace commission. I did not say anything to the contrary of the good service rendered by the peace commission. I did not bring the character of the Lieutenant General of the Army into the question, and it was not necessary to parade it at all. That has been done here fifty times at least in connection with this discussion. Nobody questions it; and therefore there is no necessity for putting his high and great character on the side of public expenditure. Senators had better address themselves to the special issue made by the commissioner in his own statement than a general issue of whether war with its attendant expenditures or peace at $500,000 is to be chosen. Mr. President, if we can have peace without paying any money we are entitled to it. Whom shall we pay for peace? Pay these contractors for peace made by the Indian commissioners? Is that a policy for a Government? Listen to the language of these letters and see how your public expenditures are created; but I will say before reading them and calling more special attention to them that I am told, and upon good authority, too, that $80,000 of the amount of the $300,000 appropriated was all that was expended by the peace commission; the rest went into the hands of contractors for feeding friendly Indians.

And the case is discussed, too, sir, as if there were no other expenditures resulting from the Indian treaties thus made, though Senators know well that obligations amounting to millions of dollars have been created and are created when treaties are made with Indians. But I do not complain of that; I am willing to submit to the general plans and the result of those plans that are entered into by the Government in the management of its affairs; and I should not complain, if it were before us, that $10,000,000 had been expended by this Indian peace commission. But, sir, I do complain that any bureau or Department of this Government shall permit public expenditures to grow up in this loose and unqualified manner.

I will not call for the reading again of the letter of the Commissioner, though it is a perfect answer to all that my honorable friend from Maine has said, because it is upon the special issue and not upon the general issue, but I will read the letter of these contractors addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and see how "Barkis was willin'" in this case:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 23, 1868.

SIR: Your letter of yesterday is received, in which you inform me that the appropriations for feeding friendly Indians are now nearly exhausted, and that I will, therefore, cease feeding under my two contracts of 12th November last, within thirty days from the date of the receipt of your letter.

You further inform me that this action is rendered necessary by the fact that, although you have recommended Congress to appropriate funds to continue feeding the Indians, it has not yet done so.

If you think that Congress will make appropriations for this purpose, and desire me to do so, I will go on feeding under my contracts until Congress shall have had time to act on the recommendation for further appropriations.

Please advise me what are your views and wishes on the subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

Hon. N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

"Barkis was willin'," sir! Then here is a letter from the other contractor; for that matter they might have saved by simply duplicating the first letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date informing me that the appropriations for feeding the friendly Indians, under my contract with the Department of 12th November last, are nearly exhausted, and although further appropriations have been asked for they have not yet been made; and directing me, therefore, to cease furnishing supplies under said contract within thirty days from the date of the receipt of your letter.

If the Department thinks that Congress will make the appropriations I am willing to go on feeding the Indians under my contract until Congress shall act on the recommendation referred to.

Very respectfully, yours,

LOUIS STETTAUER.

Hon. N. G. TAYLOR,

Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Well, sir, there is another case of willingness to go on feeding friendly Indians, but Congress did not make the appropriations. If the case had been stated by a Department of this Government, and it was founded upon the statement of the peace commission, with General Sherman at its head, Congress would have made the appropriation promptly; but there is no such paper here, there is no such authority for the continuance of this contract. All I have to say in conclusion is, that if you go on making appropriations for such violations of the public service and such an abuse, and call them deficiencies, they deserve another and a worse name.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of somebody what the legal obligation was, if any, to feed these Indians any further, and if there was no legal obligation, what particular necessity there was for it in April?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The peace commission, as we call it, was appointed to go out upon the plains and meet the Indians who were threatening war, and invite them to a friendly conference, and $300,000 were appropriated to feed them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am speaking of last April. It seems that up to last April the appropriation was sufficient.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. A portion of the deficiency had occurred prior to that. We have had within a week or ten days some of the results of this negotiation in the shape of treaties. They are still negotiating with the Indians.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then do I understand that this was continuing an arrangement made with the peace commission before?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is my understanding. While, of course, I have no information on this particular item, my understanding is that it grows out of that general fact.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not know personally anything about this transaction. I wish I did. If the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs were present he doubtless could give all the information we so much need. I have attempted to pick up some information since this discussion began, from an officer of the Indian Bureau, the chief clerk; I wish to give my authority as I proceed; and I learn from him that this state of things existed.

During the July session of 1867 Congress authorized this peace commission, and made a small appropriation to be used by them personally in giving presents and supplying food to Indians, and made an appropriation of $300,000 to be applied in procuring food for the friendly Indians that might separate themselves from the hostile Indians. That is, where bands of any tribe were inclined to be peaceable, but were being drawn into a hostile organization to make war on the settlements, if the peace commissioners could induce them to separate from the hostile tribes, this money was to be used to feed them, for it was known to every one conversant with the subject that if a band should separate from the tribe after the tribe had declared their purpose to make war, the hostile part would make war on the peaceable portion, and thus compel them to fight if they were not able in some way to escape. To meet that difficulty, this appropriation of $300,000 was made to provide for those who might separate from the hostile tribes and cluster around the settlements and live quietly until peace should be made with the principal portions of the bands.

Before the Indian department applied any money they turned over to this peace commission $80,000 of the $300,000, which was applied directly by the members of the peace commission in person on their personal view of the necessity for its use. This left, as will be seen, $220,000 of the $300,000. They induced the Indians to collect at Fort Cobb in what is called the leased district of the Indian country, down near the border of Texas, bands from the Kiowas and Comanches and Apaches, bands of Indians in connection with tribes who were making war. The number collected there is represented to me by the chief clerk to have amounted to something over seven thousand, who were induced to come in by the peace commission; and as they came in the Department was notified by the peace commission of their assembling at that point and was advised to send food to them at that fort. They also notified the Department that other bands had been collecting at the north bend of the Arkansas river under the advice of the peace commission in order to get away from the hostile portions of the tribes. Under their advice the Department sent food to those collected at that point. They were also requested to send a large amount of rations to Fort Laramie northwest toward the Rocky mountains; and perhaps about fifty or sixty thousand dollars were applied in sending rations up there on direct requisitions of the peace commission.

It will thus be seen that the object sought by the Department was to fulfill the arrangements made by the peace commissioners themselves. They sent this food to Indians who had separated from the hostile tribes in pursuance of an arrangement made by the peace commissioners, and I suppose they felt justifiable in exhausting all the money that was appropriated in this way, and in permitting these contractors, perhaps, to go a little beyond it. It will be seen by the Senate that of the one hundred and seventy odd thousand dollars asked for here, $80,000 were applied by the peace commissioners directly, leaving less than $100,000, and of that nearly one hundred thousand dollars of excess about fifty or sixty thousand dollars were in pursuance of direct requisitions made on the Department by the peace commissioners to supply Indians collected at Fort Laramie to make treaties between themselves and the United States.

Then it appears from these letters that when the appropriations were about exhausted the Department notified the contractors, and they, of course, if they supplied anything beyond that, did it at their own hazard. Congress may appropriate it or not as they see proper. Of course no one here can know, nor can any Senator ever know, whether every dollar's worth of these provisions was applied as it ought to have been. It is unfortunately true that human nature is sometimes weak, and all men are not honest, as we have learned to our sorrow; but I do not believe that there is in any department of the Government that amount of fraud and corruption which we might be induced to believe by some of the speeches that have been made here to-night. I believe that a majority of mankind are honest and disposed to do right; and I think this remark is as applicable to the Interior Department as to any other Department of the Government. Moreover, perhaps I ought to remark that all these accounts will be examined in the usual way. They will have to be first tested by the officers of the Government in the immediate vicinity, and under whose eyes these provisions were supplied.

Mr. CONNESS. What officers?

Mr. HARLAN. The superintendents of Indian affairs and the Indian agents, frail men, of course, like the rest of us. They may do wrong; perhaps some of them have done wrong. Then they go to the Indian Bureau, and there they are subjected to all the tests that any vouchers are subjected to in relation to expenditures under any department of the Government. From that bureau they go to one of the Comptrollers of the Treasury, where they undergo his supervision. So that I think it is stretching a little to suppose that this is, in the first place, a gigantic fraud, or if there have been some irregularities, that they will not be ferreted out, and that in a majority of cases any transaction connected with this service that has been wrong will not be exposed.

As I before remarked, I do not know personally whether this is right or not; but the facts I have submitted I have derived from the source I have named, and on the whole I feel inclined to vote for the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. The argument so far proves that it is possible that there may have been a necessity for this expenditure, and that it may have been all right. It does not go further than that. Gentlemen simply undertake to make out a case showing that it may be possible that this is right. I undertake to say that there is no affirmative proof that it is. There is nothing here to show that the peace commission ever ordered these supplies, and I do not believe they did. If General Sherman stated that this was necessary, and that he had ordered it to be done, I would vote for the appropriations with as much confidence as I would for an appropriation in any part of the country where it was subject to tests.

Mr. HARLAN. I have it from the source I have referred to that these contracts were made in pursuance of a recommendation made by the peace commissioners, and that the letters are on file in the Department recommending it, and notifying them of the probable number of Indians that would need to be provided for at each of these points, and that the contracts were given out after due advertisement under the law as other contracts are, to the lowest bidder.

Mr. STEWART. That matter has not been examined by any committee. It seems to me the expenditure was inspired by the letter of the contractor to the Commissioner.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No. The statement is that nothing has been furnished since.

Mr. CONNESS. If the case were as now stated, I should vote for the appropriation myself; but I desire to have the Commissioner's letter read again.

The Chief Clerk read the following letter:

DEPARTMENT INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, July 14, 1868.

SIR: Referring to the matter of the subsistence of friendly Indians and to the appropriation of $300,000, made last year for that purpose, I have to say that in each of the contracts made by this bureau for supplies for such Indians there was a clause to the effect that the contractor should continue furnishing supplies for thirty days after receiving notice to cease the delivery.

Timely notice was given to the contractors to stop furnishing supplies; but owing, in a great measure, to the great distance and isolated location of the points where the subsistence was being issued to the Indians, the agents of the contractors continued delivering, and the special agents of the Department continued receiving supplies, until the cost thereof together with the cost of articles furnished by various parties under orders of the Indian peace commission, and the expenses incident to the delivery of the subsistence to the Indians, largely exceeded the amount of the appropriation.

There are vouchers now in this office in favor of Thomas A. Osborn, for supplies furnished under his contract to the amount of.....$31,042 93

And in favor of Louis Stettauer for supplies furnished to about five thousand four hundred and seventy-nine Indians in February, March, April, and May last, to the amount of.....66,981 65

Total.....$98,024 58

I am also advised that there are vouchers not yet presented for payment in favor of Mr. Osborn to the amount of about sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and two dollars and fifty-three cents for supplies furnished during month of May last to about fourteen thousand Indians. This will make about the sum of one hundred and sixty-seven thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and eleven cents, due and owing to Messrs. Osborn and Stettauer under their contracts.

In addition to this there will be required for salary of the special agents and to pay their necessary expenses the further sum of $5,000, making in all a deficiency of $172,827 11, in the appropriation for subsistence of friendly Indians.

I respectfully request that this matter be laid before Congress, with an urgent recommendation that the sum of $172,827 11 be appropriated to enable the Department to settle up this indebtedness and to pay the balances due the special agents.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. G. TAYLOR, Commissioner.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEWART. It appears from that letter that after they got notice they delivered more than they had before they got notice. They appear to have rushed in their goods pretty rapidly—$60,000 in one item, and $60,000 to come in in the months of April and May, after this notice. There was $120,000 worth rushed out there in a few days after notice was given, so that they seem to have been making hay while the sun shone.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator will see why that would be so. No one of these men perhaps owned a very large proportion of these supplies; and they bought them of other parties with a view of furnishing the Indians, and hence the stipulation in the contract that they should have thirty days' notice in advance when they should stop sending out provisions. They had bought goods and had them on hand. The food would be of no use to them, or but little use unless they sent it to the points where it was to be consumed, and they sent it out, taking their chances with Congress for an appropriation. That is just what the Senator would have done or what I would have done under similar circumstances.

Mr. STEWART. I am tired of these Indian appropriations. I see economy on everything else but Indian affairs. I want now to say a word to my friend from Maine. He speaks of the enormous expenditure of the Army. I am as much opposed to the Army going into the Indian country as he is. As I have often remarked, I do not think we need any army in the Indian country, and I do not think we need an army of Indian agents either.

I think a few such men as General Sherman, with authority to do almost what he pleased without any Army, would be a great deal better. Let him call on the inhabitants for volunteers if he wants to do any fighting, and stop your expenditure of twenty, thirty, or forty millions a year for troops in the Indian country. Under such circumstances I would trust the matter to his good sense. What there is of success in this mission is owing to his good sense. I do not think you want a horde of Indian agents or the Army in the Indian country. I never have believed in either. They are at war with each other, and are spending your money like water. I would not speak of it if it were this little item alone; but it is millions upon millions yearly, and when you go into the Indian country you hear nothing but allegations of bad faith. Call the Army officers together, and they will tell you that the Indians have been swindled all the time, and very likely the same story will be told you by the Indian chiefs. You find that you have appropriated for sending a certain amount of goods to the Indians; and the chiefs can prove to you that they never got them. I think there should be the most conclusive proofs whenever money is professed to have been expended for the Indians; we should have the most complete proof that it was done, and not mere letters stating this, that, and the other. That is unsatisfactory and unbusiness-like.

I think when everybody admits that there is a large amount of money appropriated for Indian purposes that does not reach the Indians, it is time some investigation was made. It ought to be somebody's duty to audit and inquire into these accounts, and I undertake to say the vouchers ought to be before the committee. There is a universal belief that the Indian agents and Indian contractors do not furnish the goods to the Indians. That being the case, mere letters from them ought not to be evidence to justify appropriations. The Commissioner says, with regard to $60,000 of this appropriation, that the vouchers have not come in, that it has been communicated to him that that amount of money has been expended, and therefore he asks us to make an appropriation.

Thus it will be seen we are asked to make appropriations for claims the vouchers and papers for which have not even reached the Indian office, and of course there can be no investigation, and no scrutiny of them. We are to blame for the wholesale swindling of the Indians and for these wholesale appropriations of public money, because we do not examine the vouchers and require the contractors to prove their accounts. Here is a good case to begin with. Let them prove up this case. It will keep. They were anxious to continue the contract. They furnished about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars worth, as near as I can estimate, after they had notice, in the last month, one third as much as they had in the whole year previous. This shows that they were anxious to furnish the supplies. The claim is a new one. Let these parties bring their vouchers here, and let a committee examine them. It is time there was some examination made. It is time we should stop making appropriations for deficiencies, particularly when $60,000 in this appropriation is only based on hearsay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sprague, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Conness, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Stewart—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Kellogg, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Whyte, and Yates—27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILEY. I move to amend the bill by adding as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all moneys paid as Patent Office fees shall be appropriated to a fund, to be known as the Patent Office fund, to be used for the payment of the salaries of the officers and employees, and all other expenses of the Patent Office, and for such other purposes as may be specially provided by law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator be good enough to explain that? Does it come from a committee?

Mr. WILLEY. It does not come from a committee; it is not asking any appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not quite understand it.

Mr. WILLEY. In looking over the papers the other day and reading the report of the conference committee upon House bill No. 818, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses for the year ending June 30, 1869, I was very much surprised to find that an amendment had been proposed by that committee and passed the Senate on the day before, changing the arrangements and policy of the Patent Office in a very fundamental particular. The matter had not attracted my attention at the time, because I never dreamed that a matter so foreign to the bill, so utterly outside of it, not germane to it in the least particular, would be interpolated into a bill of that character. It may be all right, nevertheless, in and of itself; but I doubt whether the practical effect of the amendment as incorporated in the bill to which I have alluded will not be disastrous in the extreme, and result in bringing the Patent Office affairs to a dead lock.

I shall not at this time take occasion particularly to animadvert upon what I think is becoming a vicious species of legislation. I allude to the fact that our conference committees very frequently incorporate fundamental provisions in a bill not germane to the bill at all, and which have a very decided and controlling effect upon the policy of the country, and of which Senators have had no notice in the world. I should not be surprised if we woke up some of these days and found that we had made a declaration of war against Great Britain or France or some other of the leading Powers of Europe, through the report of a conference committee on an appropriation bill, or something else of that character. I am not certain that the provisions of the amendment are of themselves not right. I have been of opinion, from my relations to the Patent Office for some time, that very fundamental changes ought to be made in that establishment, in its arrangements, in its management, and in its control. I think it would be good policy, if possible, to place that bureau entirely and distinctly under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. But to incorporate a little isolated amendment in an appropriation bill, fundamentally changing the operations of the Indian office as now organized, without reference to other portions of the laws that affect the operations of that department, is, in my opinion, unwise; and if this provision is allowed to remain as it is it must result disastrously to the management of that office. What is the provision to which I allude incorporated in the appropriation bill? It is:

That all the moneys standing to the credit of the Patent fund, or in the hands of the Commissioner of Patents, and all moneys hereafter received at the Patent Office for any purpose or from any source whatever, shall be paid into the Treasury as received, without any reduction whatever, and the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated for salaries and miscellaneous and contingent expenses of the Patent Office, and for withdrawals and for moneys paid by mistake, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to communicate to Congress at the commencement of every December session a full and detailed account of moneys received for duties on patents.

I will not undertake to say that there is any provision in this amendment that is not of itself, perhaps, a proper one, and if it were in its proper place, and if it were made in connection with other modifications in the economy of the Patent Office department, so as to harmonize with this, then I should think it might be proper policy to adopt some such arrangement as is here prescribed. But, sir, if Senators will pay attention to the amendment they will see that its operation must be disastrous. It takes from the control of the Patent Office all the funds with which the office is carried on and covers them into the Treasury. It is true there is a distinct appropriation made of $250,000, out of which the expenses of the Patent Office and the salaries of the clerks, &c., are to be paid, and this fund is to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; but the money is to be paid into the Treasury Department, and according to the terms of this provision it would give the Secretary of the Interior a kind of control over the Treasury Department. I suppose it is very probable the Secretary of the Treasury might demur to the interference of the Secretary of the Interior with moneys covered into his Department, unless there be some provision made in addition to those in this amendment, prescribing the mode in which requisitions shall be made upon him by the Secretary of the Interior or by the Commissioner of Patents. There are no such provisions made; and this amendment seems to have been made without reference to other rules and regulations for the management of the Department, and if allowed to remain as it is it must necessarily bring the operations of that Department into conflict and produce disaster.

If the amendment is to be insisted upon, if we are to encounter the risk of these difficulties to which I have invited the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I would be willing to agree to postpone this matter, and would suggest that he allow the insertion of a provision that it shall not take effect until the 1st of March next, so as to permit the Committee on Patents or some other committee to conform the other arrangements of the Patent Office to this provision. I should have no objection to that; for it has been in the contemplation of the Committee on Patents to revise the whole system of the Patent Office department; and that labor has been partially performed, performed to our hand by the commission for the codification of the laws, in an admirable analysis and adjustment of the patent laws in a very convenient bill which, by a revision upon the part of Congress, might be adapted so as to include the provisions in this amendment by harmonizing them with the other provisions required for the operation of that department.

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars are appropriated to carry on the operations of that department. Doubtless the chairman of the committee had estimates upon which that appropriation was based, and it may possibly be amply sufficient. Doubtless, too, he was informed as to what the effect the covering of this money into the Treasury might have upon contracts already made under existing laws by the Commissioner of Patents for printing and for various expenses of the office. Unless he has taken these things into consideration, unless he has been fully informed in regard to them, he takes out of the hands of the Commissioner of Patents, who now, by law, is authorized to make these disbursements, authorized to make these contracts and to pay these expenses, all the funds in the Patent Office out of which these expenses are to be paid and these contracts to be satisfied, and has left him no means to discharge his duty in that behalf. The result will be that those with whom he has made contracts will be put to great detriment, disaster will be brought upon them; and I am satisfied from my knowledge, which is not, of course, very intimate, with the economy of the Patent Office and the laws now existing for the regulation of its affairs, that if this provision is allowed to remain without other modifications conforming it to other provisions regulating the affairs of the Patent Office, disaster must result and the operations of the Patent Office be brought for the present to a dead lock.

I throw out these suggestions to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and hope he will allow either this provision to be incorporated in this bill, virtually restoring the arrangement of the Patent Office to the condition in which it was before the passage of the appropriation bill to which I have referred, or that he will submit to the incorporation of a section in this bill postponing the operation and effect of the amendment incorporated in that appropriation bill until the 1st of March next, so as to enable the Senate Committee on Patents, or some other committee, to conform the other regulations of the Patent Office and make them harmonize with the provision of the amendment on the appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire only to say a word. I suppose the Senate understands that this is a proposition to reverse the judgment of the Senate expressed a few days ago in regard to covering the Patent Office fund into the Treasury. It was not very fully considered, to be sure, before the Committee on Appropriations; but it is very difficult to conceive how it is that this department should be embarrassed, having at its disposal $250,000 to carry on the expenditures of the office, with the provisions of law remaining as before, no change whatever being made in the powers and duties of the office. I say it is very difficult to see how, with $250,000 at the disposal of this officer, he can be embarrassed in the discharge of his duties. I said on a former occasion all that I had to say on this subject. The Senate having acted on the former occasion, and this money having been covered into the Treasury, my own judgment is that it had better remain until December. If any evil consequences follow from it, which for myself I do not apprehend, they can then be corrected. As to the amount of appropriation made, whether it is sufficient or not I do not know. I hardly think, upon the rate of expenditure of that office for the last year, it would be sufficient for the year; but my honorable friend will agree with me, I fancy, that $250,000 is an ample appropriation until Congress meets again in December. Under these circumstances I should hope the Senate would stand by its judgment of the other day, and vote down this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLEY. That provision incorporated in the appropriation bill to which I have referred is not yet a law, and so I think it may be in time to offer the following amendment to this bill:

And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Patents is hereby authorized to pay those employed in the Patent Office since the 1st day of August, 1865, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents at the rates fixed by law for these respective grades: Provided, That the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund, and that the compensation thus paid shall not exceed that received by those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners of patents for the same period.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that in order?

Mr. WILLEY. I sent the proposition to the Committee on Appropriations at the direction of the Committee on Patents the other day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think there was notice given of the intention to move the amendment, and I suppose it is authorized by the Committee on Patents, because it is moved by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. WILLEY. Yes sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the Senator's view about this being paid out of the Patent Office fund?

Mr. WILLEY. Yes, sir; that is the provision.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That fund having been covered into the Treasury by a former law, how does it apply?

Mr. WILLEY. It is not covered into the Treasury yet, because that bill has not become a law.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit that we do not know that, and cannot know it. As to the action of both Houses ultimately, it is a law. Whether in point of truth it has yet been signed or not we do not know. All we can say is, that we have not received notice of its signature. But so far as the action of the two Houses is concerned that money has gone into a general fund; it is covered into the Treasury. Now, here is a provision in contravention of that law, proposing to treat it as a distinct fund when no such fund exists, and when we have disposed of it otherwise by legislative action. I submit that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WILLEY. I see no inconsistency whatever. There is a certain amount of proceeds of the Patent Office which are to go into the Treasury. It is the Patent Office fund, to all intents and purposes to be paid into the Treasury. All the fees, all the proceeds of the Patent Office, are now to go into the Treasury, and there to constitute, to all intents and purposes, the Patent Office fund, and I see no incongruity or inconsistency in the form of the amendment which I offer. It may be paid out of the Treasury from the money that goes into the Treasury from the Patent Office. As far as I am concerned I desire simply to state what the facts are in the case. Some time ago, by the instruction of the Committee on Patents—

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I wish to understand where we are. I submitted a point of order, and it ought to be decided. It is not debatable unless it is submitted to the Senate or an appeal is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the point of order?

Mr. CONKLING. The point of order I endeavored to state before, Mr. President. It is, that having passed a law which extinguishes the patent fund and covers it into the Treasury, it is not in order now to appropriate from that fund which has ceased to be in contravention of the action of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not know that that involves a question of order. Congress may enact a law one day and repeal it the next, or modify it in any shape. It does not involve a question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. This does not propose to amend or repeal the law, but it proposes to make an appropriation out of a fund which has been annihilated by legislative action, and is not the subject of appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot know anything about those facts. The Chair does not think that there is any question of order involved. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I submit this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the sum of $6,200 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the pay of additional clerks in the office of the Surgeon General for the year ending June 30, 1869.

Mr. CONNESS. Was that referred?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; and it is right in itself. It is rather to supply an accidental omission made in a bill we passed the other day.

Mr. POMEROY. Is that a deficiency for 1869?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. The House of Representatives made large reductions in the clerical force of all the Departments, and among others the Surgeon General's office. The Senate restored a large number of them partially; but the committee of conference adjusted the matter, and this was left out. The Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to move it. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to think it is right.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to the Senator that it should be in a different shape, perhaps. The number of clerks authorized in that Department is not appropriated for in the legislative bill which has passed both Houses. In the committee of conference the Senate amendment was lost, so that all the clerks which the office is authorized by law to have are not appropriated for. I suppose the Senator's intention is to appropriate for that number of clerks. The object is to appropriate for the clerks that are authorized by law.

Mr. NYE. Allow me to ask a question. It is the custom, I understand, at that Department to assign what they call hospital stewards to perform clerical duties.

Mr. WILSON. They must be paid.

Mr. NYE. They are paid out of the Army appropriation. They detail a certain number of enlisted men, whom they call hospital stewards. The museum on Tenth street is full of them. It is so full of them now that they are sticking out of the windows all the time. [Laughter.] They get bright young men to enlist as soldiers in the Army, with a promise that they shall be made officers, and they have been in the habit of detailing such men and calling them hospital stewards. I will give you one little incident. A year ago we made an appropriation of $60,000 to publish certain medical works, and $30,000 of it was appropriated by name to the publication of the work of Dr. Baxter, which was to be independent of the direction of the Surgeon General. To save that appropriation fifteen hospital stewards were sent to Dr. Baxter as clerks, all of his clerks being dismissed save one. The pretense of the Surgeon General now is that he has exhausted the appropriation of $30,000 made for Baxter to get out a work of his own, charging the hospital stewards' clerkships to the portion of it belonging to Baxter as absorbing the fund. Now, sir, if hospital stewards are good enough for Baxter they are good enough for the Surgeon General. I object to this proposition in toto. The Surgeon General does not want any more clerks. The hospital stewards are there so thick now that they are in the way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend got up to ask me a question.

Mr. NYE. I ask why it is necessary to have $6,200 appropriated for clerks in the Surgeon General's office when he has hospital stewards all around him?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is my friend very sure that there are any hospital stewards there at all?

Mr. NYE. Yes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not ask whether they are very thick, but whether there are any there at all.

Mr. NYE. There are fifteen in the employ of Baxter now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that the hospital stewards all disappeared when that class of troops were dismissed. They were mustered into the service of the United States, and when the troops were mustered out they went out with them. I am told that there are no hospital stewards now in the Army. Probably those hospital stewards, which in the honorable Senator's imagination are so thick, and which as a matter of fact he must have seen, are those that linger around, and have grown to be clerks.

Mr. NYE. How have enlisted men grown to be clerks?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose they were mustered out of the military service, and have been employed as clerks.

Mr. NYE. I thought there might have been some medical transformation. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that they enlisted for five years, and if enlisted as hospital stewards since the war, they can hardly have been mustered out unless it was done on purpose to turn them into clerks.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I only spoke from the impression made on my mind by information I have received. I was about to say on this amendment that I think it turned out on the conference as to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on these matters, we were a little sharp on this particular branch of the service, and the force was cut down below the demands of the service. That is my honest judgment about it, and I ought to say so much to the Senate.

Mr. NYE. I am informed that I was wrong about one point. There is a report here from the Surgeon General on this very matter, and he does not claim that these hospital stewards are paid out of the fund appropriated to Baxter, but that that fund has been used by him for getting up pictures for his own work, and he has taken all Baxter's clerks but one, and put hospital stewards there in a clerical capacity.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator has information on the subject so as to be able to state that fact, I shall make no contest about it.

Mr. NYE. There is a report here on the subject, but the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] has it, and he has left, or I would enlighten the Senator from Maine more fully on this subject. I insist upon it that these clerks will keep until morning, and it is not likely we shall get through the bill to-night.

Mr. RAMSEY. Is there any communication here from the Secretary of War on the subject?

Mr. NYE. There is.

Mr. RAMSEY. Any request for this increase of clerical force?

Mr. NYE. There is a report here upon a resolution introduced by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and it is in the possession of the Senator from Rhode Island. My honorable friend from Maine said just now so triumphantly and convincingly that there was no such thing as hospital stewards any more that he almost frightened me. I tell you that the Department is full of them, and full of them by law, too. I have the law in my hand:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to appoint from the enlisted men of the Army, or cause to be enlisted, as many hospital stewards as the service may require, to be permanently attached to the medical department under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

I tell you the Department is overflowing with hospital stewards. Why do they not detail one or two to this office and save this $6,200? If they are good enough for Baxter they are good enough for the Surgeon General. I insist upon it that the amendment should not prevail.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLE. I offer an amendment to come in after line eighty-three:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the indebtedness incurred for the Indian service in California in the years 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, and 1867, $50,000.

Mr. CONKLING. What committee does that come from?

Mr. COLE. The Committee on Indian Affairs reported this among other amendments to the Indian appropriation bill which was under consideration yesterday; and when the chairman of the committee came to this item he passed it over of his own accord, and, as I understood him at the time, stated that he would move it upon the deficiency bill. I regret very much that the chairman of the committee is not here to-night in order that he might do that if that was his purpose. Other Senators who were here at the time may probably recollect what was then said by the chairman of the committee. I will state very briefly that—

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator proceeds he will allow me to suggest that I understand no notice has been given of this amendment. I have never heard of it myself, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says he has never heard of it in connection with this bill.

Mr. COLE. If they were in their seats yesterday the gentlemen would have heard it.

Mr. CONKLING. No notice of such an amendment was given to the committee as an amendment to be offered to this bill. This is not the Indian bill; this is the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The exception is well taken unless notice under the rule has been served upon the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COLE. Was it not sufficient notice for the chairman to state that he would move it upon this bill after notice had been given of it on the Indian bill? I am not very particular about it. I have in my hand a pamphlet showing the estimate for this to be $75,000, and every item of it is also given in this report and the persons to whom the money is due, and the manner in which the indebtedness occurred in every particular.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is objected to on account of being out of order. The Chair will have to declare that it is out of order because the rule requires a day's notice to the Committee on Appropriations of the bill you intend to apply your appropriation to.

Mr. COLE. I will give notice now, then, as suggested by a Senator behind me, that I will move it to-morrow. The bill will not get through to-night. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer the amendment of which I have given notice relative to the allowances of civil employes.

Mr. CONKLING. From what committee?

Mr. VICKERS. No committee. It was offered and referred on the 13th of July.

Mr. CONKLING. That will not do if it is not from a committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise the point.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the amendment does not come from a committee.

Mr. VICKERS. I submitted it on the 18th of July and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and had it printed.

Mr. CONKLING. Not as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. VICKERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. But it is not from a committee. No committee proposes it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is not necessary that it should come from a committee.

Mr. VICKERS. A number of amendments have been offered this evening in the same way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that this is sanctioned by a committee of the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend from Maryland is under a misapprehension. He gave the proper notice, but he was not authorized to move the amendment by any committee of the Senate, and therefore it is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two things necessary on these bills. The old rule is that the amendment must come from a committee, and the new rule is that if it does come from a committee notice must be given to the Committee on Appropriations a day before it is offered.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Chair allow the thirtieth rule to be read?

The Chief Clerk read the thirtieth rule, as follows:

"30. No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation.

"All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate, proposing new items of appropriation, shall, one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the said committee."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The question will be taken on the amendments collectively with such exceptions as Senators may suggest.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask that the amendment on page 4 be excepted from the general vote.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the excepted amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I now ask for an explanation of that amendment striking out this clause:

For casual repairs of the Patent Office building, to complete pavement on the lower floor of the south wing, $8,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That was not struck out, but the clause was amended by making the appropriation exact and specific for the object of the appropriation. I ask that that clause be read as it stands now in the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For tiles for fifty-eight hundred feet of tiling for the basement story of the Patent Office building, to complete pavement on the lower floor of the south wing, $7,250.

Mr. HARLAN. I was not in the Senate when that amendment was adopted. I make no objection to it.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 17, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I rise to a correction of the Journal in regard to the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] recommitting to the Committee of Elections the case of Switzler vs. Anderson, with instructions to inquire into the charge of disloyalty against the contestant by myself. The Journal there stops. It should also state that they were instructed to inquire into charges of disloyalty against the sitting member by the contestant.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly. The gentleman from Iowa did not send up his resolution in writing, and the modification which was made afterwards was not heard by the Clerk.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is correctly reported in the Globe.

The Journal, as corrected, was then approved.

MARY JANE LIGGETT.

Mr. KOONTZ, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1435) granting a pension to Mary Jane Liggett; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REFUNDING OF DUTY ON BELLS AND CLOCK.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 344) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund duties paid on a chime of bells and clock imported for St. Joseph's cathedral, Buffalo, New York; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the duties of a set of bells and clock imported for St. Joseph's cathedral, city of Buffalo, State of New York, paid by the administrator of the diocese of Buffalo, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. SOPHIA BEELER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a small pension bill; a favor I seldom ask. The bill directs that in consideration of the gallant services of Major Abram Beeler, of Illinois, late a paymaster in the United States Army, who lost his life in preventing the capture of the steamer Belle St. Louis, on the Mississippi river, in the month of October, 1864, and by which a large amount of public money was prevented from falling into the hands of the rebels, the sum of fifteen dollars per month be added to the pension of his widow, Sophia Beeler, of Carroll county, Illinois.

Mr. MILLER. Is this reported from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MILLER. I will not object if it is referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The committee will not have time to consider it. It is one of the most meritorious cases, and as my friend from Pennsylvania is constantly getting these things through I hope he will not object. It is for the widow of a most gallant officer who lost his life in the service of the country. She is left with five young children.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let it go to the committee with leave to report at any time.

Mr. MILLER. I do not object if the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions does not object.

Mr. PERHAM. I do not object; but it is larger than is granted in similar cases.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I give notice that no other pension act shall get through; and I now demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask consent to report from the Committee of Claims a bill for the relief of Lieutenant John H. Ossler, of Ohio.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] objects to a little pension to a widow.

FUNDING BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for other purposes, of which I gave notice yesterday that I would ask its consideration this morning. It has been printed with the amendments. I wish to make a statement in relation to the business of the committee in order to submit the question of its immediate consideration to a vote of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the consideration of the bill in the House, as it contains an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I shall then be compelled to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not necessary; it goes to the Committee of the Whole under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHENCK. In considering the bill in Committee of the Whole, I ask that an order be made that all general debate be dispensed with, and that the bill be debated under the five-minute rule. If I may be allowed to say a word, I will state that when we get into Committee of the Whole we shall meet with this question: my colleague on the committee [Mr. MOORHEAD] has charge of the tariff bill, which has now precedence as a special order in committee, and I shall move to take up the funding bill, laying aside all other business, which will include the laying aside for the present of the tariff bill.

Mr. SPALDING. And the appropriation bills also?

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing to submit to the House as a test question; whether it will give precedence to the tariff bill or the funding bill, both coming from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall insist upon adhering strictly to the parliamentary rules on this question.

Mr. SCHENCK. My proposition is to postpone all other business and take up the funding bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. There is a small appropriation bill pending which will not take more than half an hour to dispose of. As soon as that is finished others will have to come in. I shall insist on considering the appropriation bills.

Mr. SCHENCK. As I understand it, only the tariff bill has precedence; none of the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The tariff bill has precedence, because the Committee of the Whole have commenced its consideration, and it is now unfinished business in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHENCK. The question is between the tariff and the funding bill. My motion does not affect the appropriation bills, for they will be in no better condition than if it was not made.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. We can pass the little appropriation bill in half an hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to lay aside all other business in order to take up the funding bill; and I wish a decision of the House as between the two bills, the tariff and the funding bill, which shall have precedence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] makes the point of order that the bill contains an appropriation, and should go to the Committee of the Whole. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing it should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole if the gentleman will not restrict debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. How long a debate does the gentleman want?

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my proposition.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. SCHENCK; and there were—ayes 53, noes 37.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the yeas and nays are called I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Whether the effect of this vote, if it should prevail, to postpone prior orders, would not be to give precedence to the funding bill over the tariff bill in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the question. It will make the tariff bill secondary to the funding bill in Committee of the Whole. That is to say, the funding bill will first be disposed of.

Mr. SPALDING. And the appropriation bill also?

The SPEAKER. And all other bills.

Mr. O'NEILL. Can I ask a question?

The SPEAKER. A parliamentary question, not an argumentative one.

Mr. O'NEILL. To settle all difficulty, I would ask whether the friends of the funding bill—and I presume most of those who are in favor of that bill are in favor of the tariff bill—will not consent to let us have an evening session for the purpose of considering the tariff bill?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is this in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is aware that that is not a question affecting parliamentary law. The Chair, therefore, declines to answer it.

Mr. O'NEILL. It is a question leading to it. I hoped my suggestion would have been accepted as a compromise.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 58, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Boyden, Brooks, Reader

W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dixon, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kerr, Knott, Lafin, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Mallory, McClurg, McCullough, Mullins, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pile, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Van Trump, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, and William Williams—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Cary, Covode, Dawes, Driggs, Eckley, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hamilton, Higby, Hotchkiss, Kelsey, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Randall, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benton, Blaine, Boles, Burr, Rodrick R. Butler, Chandler, Churchill, Cobb, Cornell, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, Fox, French, Gravelly, Halsey, Harding, Heaton, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Root, Ross, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Twitshell, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—83.

So the motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Washington Target-Shooting Association, in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 678) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1869;

An act (H. R. No. 761) to construct a wagon-road from West Point to Cornwall Landing, all in the county of Orange, State of New York; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 329) to amend the fourteenth section of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes."

REPRESENTATIVES-ELECT FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of Francis W. Kellogg, Charles W. Buckley, Charles W. Pierce, and Thomas Haughey, claiming to be elected Representatives from the first, second, fourth, and sixth congressional districts respectively of the State of Alabama, and I move their reference to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BROOKS. Would it be in order to ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections to see if there was any contesting vote in the case of these members from Alabama, or if only one side voted, and to get a return of the votes from the State of Alabama in these particular districts?

Mr. DAWES. I am unable to answer, because nothing has been communicated to the Committee of Elections except the naked credentials.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the committee will ascertain whether there has been any election in Alabama or not for members of Congress except by one side, by one set of men only, or a mere primary meeting of the people altogether on one side, holding one set of opinions—whether, in fact, there has been what, in the language of the law, is known as an election or only primary meetings.

Mr. PAINE. Perhaps the people are all on one side.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections, as well as they may be able, discharge any duty imposed upon them by the House. Thus far their duty has been simply to ascertain whether a prima facie case exists, whether the credentials are in due form of law.

Mr. CULLOM. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] if he knows of any law in Alabama or in the United States to prevent the people voting all on one side if they desire to do so?

Mr. BROOKS. The act of Congress forbade any election except under certain circumstances. Yet in violation of that act of Congress, in force at the time the vote was taken, certain persons are here from Alabama claiming seats on this floor.

Mr. DAWES. That is a little premature. Nothing appears as yet before the House, or has been referred to the Committee of Elections, except certain papers purporting to be credentials. If the committee should report them to be in due form they will, as thus far instructed, have performed their duty.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be now suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Can a majority suspend the rules to-day?

The SPEAKER. The rule states that a majority can suspend the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole. The rule, which is to be found on page 57 of the Digest, is as follows:

"The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union."

Mr. DONNELLY. I rise to make a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the funding bill.

Mr. DAWES. I desire the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion until I can make a report from the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio withdraws his motion the Chair will have to recognize the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] who desires to make a report from a committee of conference, a matter of the very highest privilege.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would have no objection to yielding to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] but I do not want to open the door so as to allow the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to come in also.

Mr. DONNELLY. My report will take but a minute or two.

Mr. MULLINS. I insist that the business be carried right along direct.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. SCHENCK; and upon a division there were—ayes seventy, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the committee will proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, all other business in Committee of the Whole having been laid aside for that purpose.

The bill was then read at length, together with the amendments reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment, the first amendments in order being those reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The first section was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations as he may prescribe, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after twenty, thirty, and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at five per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent., which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes; and the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption or payment, at the option of the holder, or purchase of, or exchange for, an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States other than the existing five per cent. bonds and the three per cent. certificates, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all outstanding or existing obligations as limited herein, and no more, but not to exceed $700,000,000 shall be of the issue redeemable in twenty years.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of Ways and Means was to the first clause of the section, to insert the words "not less than fifty dollars" after the words "The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations."

Mr. SCHENCK. It is so late in the session, and so much opportunity for general debate has already been had by members of the House, in and out of committee, for the last seven or eight months, that I am admonished to ask the House to let all debate upon this bill be a mere business discussion. For that purpose I now move that the committee rise, in order to close all general debate on this bill, and leave it subject only to the five-minutes' business discussion.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope not. I think the fairest way will be to confine the debate strictly to the subject of the bill and allow no political discussion. This is the most important bill that has come before Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is now in order.

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise; and upon a division there were—ayes 65, noes 36.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole, pursuant to order, had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the special order all general debate shall cease in two hours.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Less than that will be enough.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; I will say one hour.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that if we are not going into general debate on this bill there is no fairness or justice in limiting general debate to one hour or two hours; there should not be one minute allowed for general debate. Let there be no limit to general discussion, or let all the discussion be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SCHENCK. That will entirely suit my ideas. I am willing to modify my motion to conform to that suggestion.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we are going to have two hours of general debate it should be on the condition that each speaker shall be limited to twenty minutes. It would not be fair that two members should occupy the whole of the two hours.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I shall move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] so as to restrict general debate to half an hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. By way of testing the sense of the House I will move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill be limited to two hours, each speech to be limited to twenty minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can now move his amendment to confine debate to half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The limitation of speeches to twenty minutes will require unanimous consent, as it changes the rule.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio so as to restrict debate to half an hour. I think we can all understand the bill well enough in that time.

Mr. SCHENCK. As there is objection to limiting speeches to twenty minutes, I withdraw my motion allowing two hours for general debate, and move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania so as to allow half an hour for general debate.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. BROOKS. Upon an important bill like this, involving so many million dollars, I feel it my duty to demand the yeas and nays on limiting debate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 69, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Broomall, Churchill, Reuder W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Daves, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Elna, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Griswold, Hamilton, Hill, Hinds, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Koontz, Laflin, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McGurg, McKee, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Plants, Polsey, Pomeroy, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson 70.

NAYS—Messrs. Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Beck, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cuke, Cary, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Culloin, Delano, Dockery, Eldridge, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goldaday, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelsey, Kerr, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Marshall, McCulloch, Mercer, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Pike, Poland, Randall, Ross, Smith, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, Woodbridge, and Woodward 69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Aroher, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benton, Blaine, Boies, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Chandler, Cornell, Dewesse, Dodge, Eggleston, Perry, Finney, French, Halsey, Harding, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Phelps, Pile, Price, Prunyn, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Sigreaves, Aaron P. Stevens, Taffe, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Wood 62.

So the motion of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the funding bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate has been limited to ten minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, as some complaint has been made in regard to the restriction of debate upon this bill, I desire to have it clearly understood how and why it is that this limitation has been enforced upon the motion I have made. It is unnecessary to speak of the necessity of limiting debate on this bill at this stage of the session, if there is to be any positive action on the bill before Congress adjourns. Recognizing this fact I moved to allow; as an introductory debate on the bill, a larger latitude in the shape of general debate to extend over two hours of time, asking there should be a division of time allowing a speech of twenty minutes to each person engaged in that general debate. This would have given an opportunity to six gentlemen to have been heard at some reasonable length on the bill. The latter proposition I could not have acceded to without unanimous consent of the House, and although, under the rule, the debate could have been stopped in two hours, inasmuch as I could not get that unanimous consent of the House to limit the debate to twenty minutes, the consequence would have been in that two hours the whole time could have been occupied by any two gentlemen speaking an hour each. As the question, therefore, was between a general debate, which should be limited to two speeches of an hour each, or else putting all upon an equal footing, allowing an analysis of the bill by a business discussion in five minutes, although I preferred the latter, and made the motion I did, I wish to make these remarks as a reply to any complaint which may be made of any unfairness or inconsideration in the treatment of a bill so important as this, without sufficient opportunity to have it fully and completely passed under the consideration of the House in an unrestricted discussion.

The question, Mr. Chairman, will be first on the first amendment to this section proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. I have simply to say, what will be obvious to any gentleman who will consult the Senate bill, the insertion of the words "not less than fifty dollars" is for the purpose of giving a limitation which does not exist in any form in the Senate bill. The Senate bill does not prescribe the denomination of the bonds, but leaves them to be issued in just such form and denominations as may be agreeable to the Secretary of the Treasury. This would have enabled the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds down to the price of five dollars or any less sum he pleases. We thought, so far as the minimum was concerned, fifty dollars, the present denomination of bonds on the market, was a fair and proper one considering those making investments in bonds, and we so acted. As a limitation it would also operate as a direction under this law, if it become a law, as heretofore under other laws, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and bonds of fifty dollars, if that is specified in the bill, would be issued under its provisions, if it became a law, and thus enable people of limited means to invest as they do now in small sums in our public securities and spread them through the land creating an interest everywhere and to a wide extent in the credit of the Government.

A gentleman has intimated to me it would be well, perhaps, the amendment should go a little further than is proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, and the denomination of the bonds should be fixed at not less than fifty dollars, and they should also be in multiples of that sum, so as to secure uniformity. I will give an opportunity to the gentleman to move an amendment of that sort before the vote is taken on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to an amendment to make the bill uniform, to insert after the words "fifty dollars" the words "or a multiple thereof;" so it will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations not less than fifty dollars, or a multiple thereof, as he may prescribe.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have drawn an amendment which will probably accomplish the object of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Strike out and insert, so it will read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe of the denomination of fifty dollars or some multiple of that sum.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That will be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for general debate is not yet exhausted. If no member desires to discuss the bill further the committee will proceed to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, as modified, was reported as follows:

Strike out the words "and of such denominations, not less than fifty dollars, as he may prescribe," and insert in lieu thereof the words "as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars or some multiple of the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee informally rose to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) for the relief of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany; and

An act (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co., and Peter Rosecrantz.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles, severally with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws; and

An act (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1869.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 301) authorizing the purchase of certain public lands in Alabama; and

An act (S. No. 621) authorizing the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location.

The message further announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 480) in relation to the pay of grand and petit jurors in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 387) to fix the compensation of the United States depository at Chicago;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) continuing the refining of bullion in the Mint of the United States and branches;

An act (H. R. No. 145) in relation to the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio; and

An act (H. R. No. 2) to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria in the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia," and for other purposes.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House now concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869, and ask for a committee of conference. There are a great number of amendments, some of which strike out amendments made by the Committee on Appropriations, after very full consideration, and which will be quite sure to be non-concurred in by the House upon examination. To save time, I propose to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to see these amendments that have been made in the Senate before I consent to this motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It will take two or three days to consider them in the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I observe from the color of the paper that one half of the bill has been changed in the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is so.

Mr. BROOKS. The whole Indian department is so corrupt in its administration that I want to see what has been done.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let me say to the gentleman that I think he will be opposed to every amendment made by the Senate. We propose to non-concur in all of them.

Mr. BROOKS. They can all be printed by to-morrow morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The difference between the two Houses is so great that it will take two or three days to act upon them in the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to acting upon a report of a committee of conference agreeing or disagreeing to amendments Nos. 1, 3, 6, 7, &c.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the question recurs on concurring in the amendments of the Senate separately.

Mr. BROOKS. If they can be printed to-morrow morning I will not object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is impossible to have them printed. I would be glad to have the gentleman from New York on the committee of conference.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not want to be on it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Better let it go to a committee of conference.

Mr. BROOKS. I shall then ask for a full explanation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well. Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw the objection, and hope we shall have the bill and amendments printed.

The amendments of the Senate were then non-concurred in and a committee of conference ordered. The Speaker appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Messrs. BUTLER of Massachusetts, WINDOM, and VAN TRUMP.

FUNDING BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the funding bill.

The next amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to the first section was to strike out the words "twenty, thirty, and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at five per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.;" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Forty years, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum;" so that the section will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe and of denominations of fifty dollars or some multiple of the same, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after forty years, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum, which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "sixty-five hundredths." I think three per cent. is as much as we can afford to pay on this class of bonds, if the debt is to be funded at all. But I regard the project of funding the bonds as an effort on the part of the bankers and bondholders and their friends in this Congress to put these five-twenty bonds, which we have a right to pay in lawful currency of the country, known as "greenbacks," into gold bonds, thereby placing them outside of the power of the representatives of the people in the next Congress to pay this debt in accordance with the manner of its being contracted. The bondholders see most clearly that if this Fortieth Congress is permitted to pass away and representatives of the people are to assemble here these five-twenty bonds are to be paid according to the terms of the New York platform, and they desire now while this Congress, which they regard as their friend, is in session to fasten the debt on the country, so that it will be impossible for the representatives of the people in the Forty-First Congress to shake it off. Three per cent. is certainly sufficient to be paid upon these bonds which never cost the bondholders over forty cents on the dollar.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that English consols bearing three per cent. interest are worth twenty cents upon the dollar more than these five-twenty bonds drawing six per cent. interest. Why is this? It is because the men who deal in these bonds never understood that they were to be paid in gold. But it is now the policy of these men to manipulate the bonds and place them in a condition so that the true representatives of the people, who will represent their views upon this subject, cannot lawfully pay off this debt in the manner in which it was contracted.

I desire to call the attention of the committee and of the country to the fact that there is a persistent effort now being made in the Halls of Congress to swindle the people of this country and to prevent them from paying the debt which was contracted in five-twenties in the currency of the country, such as we pay all our individual debts in and pay our soldiers and our pensioners in.

I want gentlemen now to say whether this is "not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws," as they say in their Chicago platform, or whether it is to be construed in different sections of the country in different ways to suit particular localities and the views of individuals residing in that portion of the country. I want a square vote upon this. If we convert these five-twenty bonds into bonds that the faith of the Government is pledged to pay principal and interest in coin, I will never consent that these bonds shall bear more than three per cent. interest. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will prevail, and that "sixty-five hundredths" will be stricken out, so as to leave the bonds three per cent. bonds. When the proper time comes I shall desire to offer other amendments to the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be better that a proposition to amend such as that submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] should not prevail, offering these bonds at three per cent. Many persons think that our legislation at any rate will be fruitless, because we propose to put a bond at so low a rate of interest upon the market. I have this to say in regard to that, that if we accomplish no other object except to record a declaration upon the subject of interest in this country upon our public securities by way of an entering wedge, we shall have done very considerable if this bill shall become a law. Up to this time the United States has exhibited the spectacle among the principal commercial nations of the world of paying a higher rate of interest than any other, while at the same time it is a country and a people with more magnificent resources, not in the present only or altogether, but in the future, and with more prospect of growth than any other nation in the world. I hold, therefore, that if the time has not yet come, it is to come when this great country, with its enormous capabilities, will not be in the markets of the world paying more interest than any other commercial or manufacturing or agricultural nation occupying a high position in the civilized world.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot well do so, as I have but five minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. A short question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. HIGBY. Does the gentleman think that bonds at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. can be disposed of at par in this country or any other?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think they will be in time; but the question to my mind is not between three per cent. and three and sixty-five hundredths, but between three and sixty-five hundredths and four per cent. when we are beginning to establish the doctrine or attempting to establish the rule that the United States shall not pay higher interest on securities than other nations. The rate of three and sixty-five hundredths was selected by the Committee of Ways and Means as perhaps the lowest rate of interest at which we should assume to offer bonds under any circumstances, even with these pledges, and the character given to the bonds, which are contained in this bill. The rate of three and sixty-five hundredths is, in some respects, a fanciful rate of interest; but the principle was first adopted in reference to the seven and thirty hundredths bonds upon the argument of greater convenience, inasmuch as it would amount to just two cents per day on $100; giving a rate of calculation that bankers, brokers, and all others were interested in having adopted. The Committee of Ways and Means have adopted the same rule of computation, the same economic system of regulating the interest according to the number of days in the year—three hundred and sixty-five. I hope that, whatever may be the fate of a motion which I have been advised will probably be made to increase the rate to four per cent., the motion to reduce the rate from three and sixty-five hundredths to three per cent. will not prevail; because my desire is—although it may seem to some gentlemen not to be a practical bill now—to take the principle and make it what I believe it will hereafter become, a practicable principle in the character of the securities which this country shall continue to issue to the world.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. Ross, to strike out "three and sixty-five hundredths" and insert "three;" and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 20, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, and Mr. Ross were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 28, noes 75.

So the amendment of Mr. Ross was not agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I move to amend the portion of the section proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means by striking out the word "and" between the words "thirty" and "forty" and inserting after the word "forty" the words "and fifty;" so that that portion of the section will read, "redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty years, respectively," &c. If that amendment shall prevail, I propose to follow it up by adding to the next clause of the section the words "and bonds falling due in fifty years shall bear interest at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum;" and that the provisions of the section which the Committee of Ways and Means recommend be inserted shall be made applicable to that class of bonds. This will give us four classes of bonds, at twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty years, at rates of interest respectively of five, four and a half, four, and three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum. This last class of bonds would be a class of bonds that could be purchased at any time at par for the currency of the country, and could be sold again whenever the holders of the bonds ask for currency for use in their business.

Now, the effect of reducing the rate of interest on all these bonds, as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, to three and sixty-five hundredths per cent., would be to render this whole bill valueless, as no holder of the present bonds would be willing to make the exchange. There being nothing in the bill requiring the holders of the present bonds bearing interest at five and at six per cent. to exchange them, of course they would not do so, but would prefer to take the risk in regard to the Government standing by its obligations as they now exist under the law. And I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] and to this House that the United States never yet paid a debt and never will by giving its note for it, any more than the gentleman from Illinois can pay his debts by giving his notes for them.

Mr. ROSS. Does not the gentleman pay his debts by giving notes?

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. No, sir; not my notes.

Mr. ROSS. The gentleman pays greenbacks.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Greenbacks are not my notes but the notes of the United States. I may extend the time of payment by giving my notes; but when the notes fall due I must pay them in values satisfactory to the creditor.

Mr. ROSS. I pay all my debts with greenbacks.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. The United States cannot, any more than an individual, pay its debts by giving its notes; nor do we propose to do it. I am free to admit that under the law, when these bonds are due and become claims and demands these notes are receivable in payment; but these bonds, not being due, are not claims and demands, and these notes cannot be tendered to the holder of these bonds. But if, at the maturity of these bonds, when they become claims and demands against the Government, if the Government is then unable to pay the bonds in coin or its equivalent it may under the law extend the time of payment as the law now stands. Whether it would be advisable for the Government to do this—

Mr. ROSS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government has not authority to pay now a portion of the five-twenty bonds?

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. It has no authority under the law to pay them now in United States notes, but only when they become claims and demands, and then it would only be an extension of the time of payment.

Mr. ROSS. My understanding is that at any time after five years we have a right to pay them.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. No, sir; they are only redeemable, not payable, after five years. They are payable at the end of twenty years.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman explain the difference between redeeming a note and paying it? It seems to me a distinction without a difference.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. If there is no difference in the terms why employ both in the law? It would have simplified the matter very much to have made the bonds payable after five years. As I understand there are three provisions in the law issuing United States notes. The first provision prescribes under what circumstances these notes shall be received by the United States. The law provides that they shall be received for all debts due to the United States except duties on imports. The second clause prescribes how these notes shall be received by the creditors of the United States, and that is for claims and demands against the Government. Then there is a third proviso with reference to debts within the United States.

Now, I wish the House to notice one fact in regard to these notes, that they are lawful money and payable for debts within the United States. The first two clauses make provision for cases where debts are due to and by the United States; and the third clause makes provision with reference to debts within the United States to which the United States is not a party. And the word "public" must be construed as referring to corporations or other public bodies and not to the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. If it be in order, I move to amend by striking out in the fifteenth line "three and sixty-five hundredths" and inserting "four."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not now in order. One amendment to the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means is already pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to comment on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HUBBARD.] This amendment is designed to improve that part of the text of the Senate bill which the Committee of Ways and Means recommend to strike out. I will first ask the amendment to be reported, because I think that it has not yet been reported from the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia indicates if that amendment shall prevail, establishing a fourth class of these bonds at a lower rate of interest, to add a corresponding clause to the language of the Senate. Now, sir, I hope the language of the Senate will be stricken out and we will have one class of bonds provided for forty years, or make it, if you will, fifty years. Forty years is what is proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. But, sir, inasmuch as it is among the possibilities that the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means may not succeed, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia will prevail, as it will make the text of the bill better than it is. I do not mean to concede, when I made that remark, the language of the Senate bill should not be stricken out; but I do mean if that language of the Senate classifying the bonds is to stand, I hope the text of the bill will be modified so as to make a fourth class.

The amendment of Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, was adopted.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I will move a further amendment. Strike out "and," and after "per cent.," insert "and bonds falling due in fifty years shall bear interest at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per annum." That will, in my judgment, perfect the bill. It will put the funding bill in a shape, I think, which will be acceptable to the country, and be successful in putting our debt in a shape the country will approve of.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will call the gentleman's attention to the language of the amendment. He uses the words "per cent. per annum." The Senate uses the word "yearly." They do not use the words "per annum."

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I do not object to that modification.

Mr. SCHENCK. Leave out the words "per annum," and the word "yearly," in the preceding part of the section, will cover them.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I will strike out the words "per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I move to strike out "three and sixty-five hundredths" and insert "four." Mr. Chairman, I join with the gentleman from Ohio that this Senate language should be stricken out. We should have bonds at forty years at four per cent. I am quite sure the whole country would be satisfied with the matter of taxation and interest if forty years' bonds be placed at four per cent. free from all taxation, even including the income tax. It cannot reasonably be expected that we can place our securities on as good a footing as those of England have been placed and funded for fifty years. We have this large mass of securities to be thrown upon the public market; and they will be gradually absorbed if we place the rate at four per cent. I know that the Committee of Ways and Means is earnest in giving the country something practicable. Instead of cheapening this bill down to three and sixty-five hundredths I hope these bonds will be placed at such a rate of interest that they can be put upon the market and a sale effected. I shall be willing to go further. I shall be willing to have interminable annuities at four per cent. That is a favorite class of security in Europe, and gentlemen who know more about it than I do, say there will be no difficulty in exchanging six per cent. bonds for four per cent. interminable annuities free from all taxation. We are merely called upon now to fix some reasonable rate of interest at which there is a probability the present holders of our bonds are willing to exchange them for others. Let us come to such a point that we can reach that reasonable probability, and for that reason I move four per cent.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, provided the House shall see fit to reject the bill as prepared by the Senate. If we mean in good faith to pass a law funding our national debt two things are essential: first, to take care of our national credit; and second, to put our securities at such a rate of interest as will probably be accepted. I do not believe that the true way for the United States to secure a low rate of interest in the future is to be constantly agitating upon the floor of Congress and throughout the country the question as to our obligation or ability to pay the debt already created. Why, sir, it is with a nation as with an individual; if you expect to borrow money at a low rate you do not go upon 'Change to-day and express doubts as to whether you will ultimately pay your debt, and then to-morrow undertake to issue your notes at a reduced rate of interest. Hence the true course for the nation is the course that an individual would take; first secure your national credit, and then you may borrow money at a favorable rate compared with that paid by any other nation.

I maintain, therefore, that the true policy of the country would be, instead of introducing questions here day after day which cause distrust to the world as to our intention to pay our debt, to give expressions of a contrary character, and then when the world believes in our good faith and intention we may expect to borrow money at a lower rate of interest. The true way to lighten the taxation which now rests upon the people, the true way of funding our national debt, is to give such expression through our national councils as will assure the world that we mean to pay. Until that is done the mere passage of this funding bill or any other will never accomplish the purpose, and it is simply, in my own judgment, a waste of time to be discussing it here. We must first establish our credit and make the world believe that we will pay our debts according to the letter of the obligation.

Mr. PIKE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew it. I hope this bill will be considered as a practicable measure. I believe it to be such, and if a little care is taken to perfect it and carry out what was evidently the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means, I think it may be a solution for much of our financial difficulties as to the payment of too great interest and taxation. I hope that this provision of the Senate bill which provides several classes of bonds will be stricken out. I do not want to see but one kind of funded debt. We have now nineteen different kinds of United States interest-bearing securities, and nobody can tell which is which, which is worth the most or the least, except he employs some broker, and then all he knows is what the broker says and what he says may be with a view to making the most money by selling or buying.

Now, I am in favor of but one class of securities, payable in forty or fifty years. Do not have this proposed sliding scale, but bring down the rate of interest to three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. And in order to make my amendment more perfect I shall propose to strike out the words "other than such income tax," so as to leave it a fifty-year loan at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. without any tax whatever. I would cut down the interest so that there shall be no occasion to tax that loan, but we shall receive the tax in the increased value of our loans. Then they will go abroad, because the rate of interest will be certain and not liable in any form to be changed.

Sir, let me tell you that exactly what the people on the other side of the water are afraid of is that our loan will be paid. They will pay more to-day for a perpetual annuity at four per cent. than for your twenty-year bonds at six per cent., or more than they will pay for forty-year bonds at five per cent. What they want is permanency of investment. The reason why your securities are not higher to-day is the danger of their being paid. In Europe there is no favorite security that is ever expected to be paid. What people want is permanent investment. Let them understand that we agree to pay the interest at a low rate, and they will take our fifty-year bonds at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest, which is double the rate that money bears in Hamburg and Frankfort. Give them that kind of security, and I have no doubt, so far as my own knowledge extends, these bonds will be taken up.

I propose to move, when we come to the amendment on the fourth page, that there shall be an income tax of ten per cent. on all of our present bonds that are not so funded, and when we have got that on the one side, and a loan of fifty years, with a certain rate of interest on the other side, this funding bill will be a working actual measure, which shall reduce the burden of taxation.

I hope, therefore, while I renew the amendment, as I have promised, that the committee's rate of three and sixty-five hundredths will be sustained, the Senate classes struck out, and that we shall strike off all taxes whatever upon the securities provided for in this bill.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] renewed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I should be in favor of retaining this at four per cent. if I supposed that the bill would in its subsequent provisions remain as it now stands, for this bill as it now stands not only allows the income and interest upon these bonds to be taxed by the United States Government as incomes from other property and interest upon other property is taxed, but it leaves by implication, I fear, to the State governments the right to insist upon taxing the interest and income of these bonds. Now, if the State governments are to have the right to tax the incomes or interest of these bonds at their pleasure, as I think the language of this bill would clearly entitle them to do, and if, in addition to that, the United States Government is to tax the income and interest on these bonds as it taxes income from other property or interest derived from other sources, then I fear that it will be necessary for us to put the interest as high as four per cent. to induce anybody to exchange the bonds now outstanding for bonds of this form. I say I apprehend that the bill as it now stands authorizes State taxation, so far as interest and income is concerned, for this reason; I find this language in the bill:

Which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes.

Now, it is these words, "and the same and the interest thereon and the income therefrom," so far as Federal taxation goes, which lead me to suspect that the States would have a right to insist on local taxation so far as income and interest are concerned.

Now, I am in favor of striking out this whole taxation by States for local purposes, whether upon the principal or interest or income of these bonds. I am in favor of striking out that provision of the bill which retains to the Government of the United States the right to tax the income or interest of these bonds in order to bring the interest on these bonds down to the lowest possible figure at which capitalists will take the bonds.

Now, as this bill stands, it seems to me that it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell these bonds in market, realizing what he can from them, and with the proceeds of the bonds take up the outstanding bonds of the United States as they exist at the present time, because I find in the bill these words:

And the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption or payment, at the option of the holder, or purchase of, or exchange for, an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States.

Now, I propose to make sundry amendments to this part of the bill so as to leave to the Secretary of the Treasury the power which alone, as I understand the chairman of the committee, the committee meant to intrust to him, namely, the power to exchange these new bonds for old ones dollar for dollar, or, in other words, to redeem old bonds with new bonds dollar for dollar. Now, to do that, we must put the interest down to the lowest possible figure. We must offer such inducements as will be sufficient to procure from capitalists the taking of this loan to redeem the other. I am, therefore, opposed to this amendment, in favor of retaining the rate of interest proposed by the committee, namely, three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum, in favor of striking out all taxation, whether Federal, State, or local, whether upon principal, interest and income, and in favor of prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury from making any other disposition of these new bonds than to exchange them directly dollar for dollar for outstanding bonds.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I renew the amendment to the amendment, for the purpose of saying a word in regard to what has fallen from members here. I am in favor of a funding bill which shall reduce the interest on our bonds. If no person shall choose to fund under such a bill, no harm will be done; if any person does choose to fund under it at a lower rate of interest than we now pay, we gain by it. Hence I am in favor of a bill of this kind; whether this is exactly the right kind of a bill or not I will not criticize, except that I think it is a tolerably fair one.

I think, however, that the lowest rate of interest must be four per cent.; I do not think you can get money cheaper than that. And I will go further and say that I do not think, as long as the five-twenty gold interest-bearing bonds are outstanding, that anybody will ever fund a dollar under this bill. Why should they? But when those five-twenty bonds are paid off, I have no doubt that large investments will be made both at home and abroad in a loan of this character. I think, therefore, that it is the duty of the Government, with the gold which is accumulating in its Treasury every year, to expend at least half the amount in redeeming the five-twenty bonds in advance of their falling due. After they fall due then no one can object to their redemption.

I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] who first spoke upon this subject to say that he understood that our outstanding bonds should be paid according to the principle of the New York platform. What is that platform?

Mr. ROSS. To pay the five-twenties in lawful money.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. You mean by "lawful money"——

Mr. ROSS. Greenbacks; that is your doctrine and mine.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hold to the Chicago platform, and, as I understand it, to the New York platform, upon these bonds; that these bonds shall be paid just according to the original contract.

Mr. PIKE. According to the spirit and letter of the contract.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. According to the law.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What was that law? That bonds of a certain amount should bear five per cent. interest in gold. Now, up to the time that they fall due we must pay them faithfully. After they fall due they are payable in money, just as the gentleman understands "money," just as I understand it, just as we all understood it when we passed the law authorizing that loan; just as it was a dozen times explained upon the floor by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means when called upon by gentlemen to explain what it meant, and just as the whole House agreed that it meant.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to have one or two minutes more.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will yield to my colleague for one or two minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I want to say that if this loan was to be paid according to the intimation of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS;] if I knew that any party in this country would go for paying in coin that which is payable in money, thus enhancing it one half; if I knew there was such a platform and such a determination this day on the part of any party, I would vote for the other side, Frank Blair and all. I would vote for no such swindle upon the tax-payers of this country; I would vote for no such speculation in favor of the large bondholders, the millionaires, who took advantage of our folly in granting them coin payment of interest. And I declare—well, it is hard to say it—but if even Frank Blair stood upon the platform paying the bonds according to the contract, and the Republican candidates stood upon the platform of paying bloated speculators twice the amount which we agreed to pay them, then I would vote for Frank Blair, even if a worse man than Seymour headed the ticket. That is all I want to say.

Mr. ROSS. The Democratic doors are still open, and we will take the gentleman in.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would prefer to take the floor at some other time, when I can have my full five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and my colleague [Mr. O'NEILL] can renew it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I renew the amendment to the amendment making the rate of interest four per cent., but I am of the opinion that four and a half per cent. would be better. I think such a rate would accomplish what is desired, and would attract the attention of the creditors of the Government more readily to the fact that we have funded our debt and would make the capitalists holding large amounts of our bonds more willing to surrender them and take those proposed to be issued under the provisions of this bill.

The idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is, as I understand, to fund our debt at a low rate of interest, so that after awhile if the bonds should not be brought to the Treasury for cancellation and reissue a penalty in the form of a tax may be imposed upon them. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I indorse no such idea which seems to me but an indirect way of taxing the bonds. Now, I am for consolidating our debt simply that we may have one loan only, and I would remind the committee and say to the country that the funding of the outstanding bonds not yet due must be a voluntary act on the part of the creditor. This bill gives merely a choice to those who hold the bonds. This Government would not dare to say to its creditors, "Your debt must be funded at such a rate as we may fix." In most cases the large capitalist would prefer a long loan, because thus he would have the advantage of holding a permanent security. It is not likely that many, excepting the large capitalists of the country, would take advantage of this funding system.

Those of more limited means, the people who held bonds to the amount of a few hundred or a few thousand dollars, would not probably surrender them for securities at a smaller rate of interest, because they have a longer time to run. They will hold on until the bonds become due, and they will expect the Government to pay them principal and interest just as was promised them, in coin or otherwise, according to the conditions under which they took them and understood them to be set forth when they subscribed to them. We cannot legislate to break the faith of the Government, nor do the friends of this bill propose to do any such thing. This funding system is entirely voluntary, and while the capitalist with his many thousands of dollars in bonds of the United States may come forward and take the consolidated loan at a low rate of interest, the humblest citizen is not compelled to do the same, nor can we, or do we intend to pass any law that would put such an obligation upon either.

The funding or consolidating our loans is not because the Government is unable to pay the debt, principal and interest, dollar for dollar as was promised. The only object of this legislation being to offer an inducement to the creditor of a long loan with less interest for his shorter one with more interest. It is such a financial measure as we should have upon our statute-book, presenting a choice, and not in any way requiring it to be made.

I think the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] who proposes four per cent., is much better than the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means; but I am sure we would subvert the interests of the Government and the people to a greater extent if we would fix the rate at four and a half upon the consolidated loan, free of all taxation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] do no more than justice to the Committee of Ways and Means when they express their conviction that the committee is in earnest about this bill, and pressing what we are now considering as a practical measure.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, we can consolidate our public debt, beginning now and proceeding more rapidly as time advances, at a rate of interest as low as that proposed in this bill, that is three and sixty-five hundredths.

I hope, therefore, no proposition to amend by inserting four per cent. or four and a half per cent., as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] has just now proposed will prevail. Instead of raising the rate of interest, if it be possible, add to the security of the bond you offer; but let the interest remain low. For instance, I have no objection instead of being forty years, as proposed by the committee, if in the judgment of the House it will add to the bond in the market, to let it be fifty or sixty years, and if the reservation of the right to impose tax, even income tax on the bond, reduces its probable value on the market, take that off and say these bonds shall be offered free from any tax, local or municipal, State or Federal. My object is to consolidate the public debt of the country as other nations have successfully done at a low rate of interest, and thus relieve now, and still more and more hereafter, as that consolidation shall become complete, the people of this country from burdens upon labor.

I do not think with my friend from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] that we are wasting time on these propositions or in considering this bill. On the contrary, I think it is time well employed. I do not expect any more than the gentleman from Maine we shall at once consolidate on the same terms on which Great Britain has been able to do it.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I did not say it was wasting time. I said it would be unless we took means first to preserve our credit.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was glad to be corrected. I thought at the same time I must have misunderstood the gentleman from New York. I do not expect any more than the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] we shall be able to consolidate our debt at a rate of interest so low as Great Britain can put hers. I know the advantage of old and populous Governments, with settled commercial habits, over ours. We need not go abroad for an illustration of this. Why are loans made at so much lower rate in the city of New York than in the State of Illinois? Just in proportion as population is sparse, just in proportion as the commercial habits are unsettled, is the rate of interest higher.

But this Government is advancing to that position of prosperity, founded upon its multifarious resources, that it ought to be able now to begin to enter into competition with other nations in getting whatever it needs upon its credit, by the issuing of this security at as low a rate as money can be furnished to other nations.

I would therefore, as I say, instead of raising the rate of interest above three and sixty-five hundredths per cent., prefer to accede to any of the amendments which gentlemen have suggested. Let it be understood that these bonds are not to exceed in amount the actual present indebtedness of the United States, or its future indebtedness as the bonds are placed, as represented by its outstanding securities; let it be understood that it is only an exchange that is to be made of one kind of security for the other; let it be understood that they are to be exempt from all taxation whatever by any authority whatever; let it be understood that they are to run for a long time; and then I say that what will follow—at first perhaps slowly, hesitatingly, but after a while with more rapidity and with more confidence on the part of our creditors or those who are willing to become such—will be that our bonds will be taken. At this time I am assured from undoubted authority derived from letters now in this capital from responsible sources, that men of character are ready to offer to take large amounts of bonds at four per cent. interest, provided they are secured in the manner proposed by these guarantees.

What is the difficulty about the five-twenty bonds? Suppose your law on the subject of those bonds is perfectly clear, and that it in terms provides not only that the interest shall be payable in coin but the principal, also; does any body pretend that any question would be made in this country as to their payment? It is only after all a question of construction, a question of the contemporaneous action through the agents of the Government that has raised any difficulty about them. But express clearly in the law that the principal and interest at all times are to be paid in coin and are to be free from taxation, and the people of the world will believe us; and I have too much faith in the people and the Government of the United States for one moment to doubt but that they will prove they are entitled to be so believed by keeping good faith to all.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. PIKE on striking out three and sixty-five hundredths and inserting four; and there were—ayes 42, noes 55; no quorum voting.

Mr. PIKE. I do not insist on tellers.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to strike out "three and sixty-five hundredths," and insert "four and a half." I do this for the purpose of pressing upon the Committee of Ways and Means a remark upon the general effect which will be produced upon the finances of the country by a proposition of the sort we are now considering. Our attention is pretty exclusively directed to the rate of interest. If we were considering the question of a loan of $100,000,000 we might very well confine our attention to that subject. But in my judgment there are more important relations which this subject assumes when we are considering a measure involving a loan of from fifteen hundred to two thousand million dollars, and that is the permanent effect to be produced upon the business and finances of the country.

I have submitted in printed form an amendment for the division of the loan into a foreign and a domestic loan. In my judgment actual resumption of specie payment is postponed indefinitely, as an affirmative proposition, if a measure of the sort now before the committee prevails; although if it be the judgment of the committee I expect to vote for the proposition, because in a matter of this sort I am inclined to waive my own judgment to that of those about me. But when you consider that this is a proposition—as in my judgment it is—to divide this loan between a foreign loan and a circulating medium at home—for I cannot expect that in a reasonable period of time the people of this country will permanently invest their money in a security bearing three and a half per cent. interest, but fifty dollar notes, bearing interest at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. will pass as circulating medium in this country—a loan at that rate, if our credit shall be established, as I trust it will be, is a desirable loan abroad. So that the effect of this measure, in my judgment, in the run of years will be to force the indebtedness of the country, except what may be used for purposes of circulating medium, into the hands of foreigners, the first effect of which will be to reduce the rate of gold premium and of exchange, and put the people of the country, not individually, but as a nation, in a condition to make large purchases abroad.

That is my first objection to the general policy of this bill; and I think it is a duty on the part of Congress, in providing for new loans, to devise, if possible, means by which there shall be a domestic loan bearing such a rate of interest as will secure investments here, and provide for a foreign loan at so low a rate of interest that it cannot ordinarily be sold in this country. If you provide a high rate of interest on all your loan, you force it abroad where money is worth less than it is here. What is the reason of the activity of bonds in New York and Boston and Philadelphia to the exclusion of the West? It is because capital in the East is cheap as compared with the West, and the bonds are driven out of the West to the markets of the East. Capital is cheap in London and Paris and Frankfurt as compared with New York and Boston and Philadelphia, and the same process which has forced the bonds out of the West into the East will force the bonds out of the East into Great Britain and upon the continent of Europe.

I am not desirous, for one, to bring about that state of things. There are five or six hundred millions of our securities owned abroad. In my judgment, we ought to do nothing to increase the amount owned abroad, but to do what we can to secure the retention abroad of the bonds now owned in foreign countries. Consider if in 1866 our banks had been paying specie, and there had been a panic in Europe, as there was growing out of the Prussian and Austrian war, and thirty, forty, or fifty millions had been demanded on the continent of Europe for the exigencies of that occasion, every bank in the country would have suspended specie payment. By forcing the loan abroad in great amounts we take upon the financial system of this country the panics, apprehensions, and disasters of Great Britain and the continent of Europe, and through the financial channels controlled by Great Britain the financial disasters of China and the East Indies.

Mr. MILLER. I rise to oppose the amendment. I am opposed to the change made by the Committee of Ways and Means in this part of the bill. It seems to me that the rate of interest fixed by the Senate—four per cent.—is low enough. It cannot be expected in this country that bonds of this kind will be taken at less than four per cent. With an assurance that we will pay interest at four per cent., the principal and interest to be paid in gold, and that Congress will not be constantly attempting to tax the bonds after they have declared by act of Congress they shall not be taxed, I have no doubt we shall have the loan taken, and I have no doubt that in that case the bonds can be sold in Europe. I am in favor of striking out of this bill the taxation of these bonds in any way. Neither the income or the interest ought to be taxed. It ought to be distinctly understood that they are to be clear of taxation, and then the people will understand the value of the bonds.

I am in favor further of issuing perpetual annuities, on the English system, at a low rate of interest, and then if we want to redeem them we can go into the market and buy them. That will give us credit in this country equal to that of Europe. The bill, as reported from the Senate, proposes a rate sufficiently low. If the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means shall prevail, I do not think it will avail anything, for I do not believe you can get people in this country to take bonds at a lower rate of interest than four per cent. That is the lowest rate at which you can get the people to take these bonds, for in this country money is worth more than that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DELANO. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I suppose the members of this Committee of the Whole have a common desire, that is to consolidate and fund our national debt at a lower rate of interest than that which we are now paying and at the lowest practicable rate. Now, supposing that is the real purpose of persons here, we ought to endeavor to bring our minds to consider the subject, so as, if possible, to arrive at the end we aim at, or, if not, then at an end which will make the nearest possible approximation to it. That we are paying too much interest now all concede; that we should hereafter pay less, all will assent to.

Now, how shall we reach the end we desire? First and foremost of all by preserving our credit. Therefore, I consider him an enemy to his country's welfare who in any way, directly or indirectly, aims a blow at the credit of the country. We have been at work saving the life of the nation; we are at work now to save the faith and credit of the nation. Therefore I disagree with all these efforts that are made looking to any measure of legislation that is really an attack, or that will by the public be received as such attack, on the national faith and the national credit. We must stand up to our bargain, not only to the letter of it, but we must live up to the spirit of it. If we do not, then if we ever again call for loans of money we shall not find a free people so willing to devote their means to our use as they have heretofore been. I say, therefore, that first and foremost in this business of funding our national debt at a low rate of interest, it is our duty to see to it that in no way do we act as to shake the confidence of men or nations in our credit, in our fidelity to contracts. An individual whose credit is gone as a business man has lost everything, and a nation that has lost her credit has lost what there is no compensation on earth for. So much for that.

The next thing I want to consider as bearing upon this question as to how and in what way we shall accomplish this end of reducing the public debt, is this: we must offer to our creditors something that they will take, something that is practicable. For if we offer them a thing they will not take, and that the world will justify them in refusing to take, we have made no advance at all. Now, I fear that the bill as amended by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House will fail for the reasons to which I have briefly alluded; because it will not be accepted by the world and by our creditors. I do not believe—and I want to put in this negation here—I do not believe that the Committee of Ways and Means concur with me in this, and that they offer this as a fond and delusive thing; far from it, I give them all credit for sincerity in this business. I only express it as my idea and my opinion that the rate of interest here proposed will not fund the national debt; we are not plethoric of money in America, but we are plethoric of undeveloped resources. We are not like old nations that have existed for hundreds of years with money and capital and resources; we want capital here to develop the immense resources in all the great West, to build up the avenues of the nation, and we must therefore offer a rate of interest that has reference to this state of things. The time may come when a three per cent. loan will be taken; but that time has not arrived yet.

And I want to say in conclusion—for I see by the tremulous movements of the hammer in your hand, Mr. Chairman, that my time is nearly out—that I prefer the Senate bill as being more likely, in this respect, to be adopted than the bill that has been reported from the Committee of Ways and Means. I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment to the amendment. I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. DELANO] in preferring the bill as passed by the Senate to the bill with the amendments proposed here. In the first place, I think it decidedly for the interest of the country to confine its indebtedness as much as possible within its own limits or to its own citizens. This country, in my judgment, had better owe $5,000,000,000 to its own citizens than one half that sum to persons in foreign countries; for, sir, the payment of interest on a foreign debt draws out of the country the very life-blood of our currency.

One objection which I have to the amendment proposed as well as to the bill as passed by the Senate is founded upon the clause reserving to the Government the right to impose on these bonds an income tax. I should think that the people of this country had had enough of uncertainty with regard to the taxation of bonds. If gentlemen desire that the money on these bonds shall be obtained from foreign countries, they must strike out the reservation of the right to impose an income tax. With an indefinite power of this kind reserved on the part of the Government, we cannot count on foreigners being induced to take these bonds. They will not be able to tell the amount of the tax which may be imposed.

I am aware that the question is still unsettled among members of the House and Senate whether we have the power to tax our foreign creditors; different opinions are entertained on this point. Some gentlemen honestly entertain the opinion that we can tax foreigners holding our bonds, and they have so voted, while others hold a contrary opinion.

Now, sir, it is the uncertainty with regard to the taxation of these bonds that would prevent their transfer to the hands of capitalists in foreign nations—the uncertainty as to how much tax we may impose, and hence how much income the holders may receive from their investment. If the tax on these bonds be fixed at a certain definite percentage, foreigners can then understand whether they can afford to invest their money upon the faith and integrity of this Government; and if we make the rate of interest at all reasonable they will be attracted to invest their money in our securities.

It has been said, especially by the gentleman from Ohio, who last addressed the House, that we cannot fund this debt of ours at the low rate of interest proposed. In my judgment that is true. What is the rate of interest in this country compared with the rate in foreign countries? and what is the price of labor in this country compared with the price of labor in foreign countries? We are all aware that both the rate of interest and the price of labor range at a higher rate in this country than abroad, though the difference is greater as to the rate of wages than as to the rate of interest. I am in favor of a policy which will confine the sale of these securities to our own citizens.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe we all desire to arrive, if possible, at the same result, and that is to secure upon our national loans the lowest possible rate of interest, at the same time accomplishing the exchange of the present outstanding bonds for those which we propose to issue. I am in favor of the principle of this bill, although I propose to offer two or three amendments. My theory is that no man will exchange a five-twenty bond, on which he is receiving six per cent. interest in gold, payable semi-annually, for a three per cent. bond or a four per cent. bond, unless there be some inducement offered for the exchange. While it is left doubtful as to what the body of the bond calls for, there will be no reason why the exchange should be made. How, under such circumstances, can we expect to induce an exchange? I believe that the only method of reaching this result is by providing a rate of taxation on all the outstanding bonds of the United States, that tax to be collectable from the interest when the payment is made; so that there may be an inducement to the bondholder to exchange such bonds for those not taxable, though paying a lower rate of interest. I think that is the only way we can arrive at it. I will illustrate this by my own case. I hold United States bonds. It is true they are but few. They are five-twenty bonds. I am satisfied with those bonds. I will not exchange the bonds I have for your funded bonds with forty years to run at three and sixty-five hundredths; and, sir, the only way you will get me to exchange what few bonds I have for bonds bearing a lower rate of interest will be to tax them, and then, fearing other taxation, I will be willing to take new bonds free from taxation. In this way we can arrive at an exchange of the bonds, and in no other way.

I am in favor of this rate of interest, three and sixty-five hundredths, one cent a day upon the hundred dollars. I think it is enough. In Massachusetts, a State smaller than many others, and certainly with less ability to pay than this great Government, borrows money from Europe to-day, and I believe she only pays three and a half per cent. I am told that I am mistaken. I had my information from a Massachusetts gentleman. If I am not correct I withdraw it as a matter of course. But, sir, I do know that we are paying a higher rate of interest than any other country, and higher than some of the States pay. I say there is no reason why this Government, with great resources, expanding in population every day, traversed by railroads, inviting investments from all the nations of the earth—there is no reason, sir, why the rate of interest should not be as low here as in any other country. In a country like this, with unsurpassed capacity for enterprise, for growth, for development in every way, shape, and form, with an invitation to all people to come and settle among us, with an unprecedented march in civilization, with the bright prospect before us, I do not see any reason why we should be called upon to pay a higher rate of interest than any other country. Let us do for the people what they desire.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. BOUTWELL'S amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. PILE. I move to strike out "forty" and insert "sixty." I understand the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will not object to this amendment.

I am asked why I do not make it "fifty." I think it is best at "sixty."

Mr. Chairman, the homely adage that "it takes two to make a bargain" is at the bottom of the whole process of funding the public debt or the principle of this bill. Those who hold securities bearing six per cent. interest will not be willing to take for them securities bearing only three and sixty-five hundredths unless the latter have some peculiar advantage which the others do not have. Increase the length of the bonds, increase the time the securities have to run, and you will, I think offer great inducements to those who hold our securities to exchange them. Therefore I move to make the term sixty years instead of forty.

I entertain, sir, the same fear as the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am certain that throughout the whole West for long years to come there will not be money to loan at three and a half per cent. There are too many broad acres to be tilled; too many resources to be developed; too many railroads to be constructed; too many cities to be built for money to be loaned at three and a half per cent. The effect of this, then, will be to drive these securities abroad to the large cities of Europe. We will have then to send out of the country to pay the interest on our bonds. Exportation will be stimulated and we will get up a system which has prevailed to a great extent in this country, of sending more money out of the country than was brought into it. The balance of trade will be, as it has been, against us. I hope, however, for the purpose of funding the debt the time will be increased to sixty years.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the change of the term of these bonds from forty to sixty years will be likely to accomplish the object indicated by the gentlemen I do not know that it ought to be objected to. But the Committee of Ways and Means have considered the whole subject and decided upon forty years.

I wish to say a few words in continuation of what I was saying when I was up before in relation to the general principle upon which this proposition is based. I agree entirely with my colleague in regard to the importance of a nation establishing for itself a credit; and I agree with him and all others who stand by the maxim that it is confidence which begets credit and then credit which gets money. I am also of opinion that it is not necessary to pay off our public debt in order to get back to specie payment, nor to any other easier or more agreeable condition of things in this country, by simply changing the forms of our securities or by any acts of legislation such as we are pressing from time to time connected with that subject, except as these may strengthen and support the great proposition that our debt is to be paid by working it out, paid by the productions of the country, paid by what we do, by what we earn.

All this, however, is apart from the propriety of adopting a system such as we now present for the consolidation of the public securities; for this is a consolidation scheme. We propose that all the outstanding obligations shall be converted into another form to be evidenced by these bonds which we offer to the country and to the people abroad. I have already said that I believe we can offer this safely at as low an interest as is proposed in the bill. I have already said, in order that the debt may be thus taken by persons either abroad or at home, we ought to pledge ourselves, as this bill proposes to do, to give and guaranty the utmost security that we can possibly offer. Let that security, then, be within the bounds of reason, the longest time that the bonds shall run; for everybody knows that a bond which has long to run and thus takes the form of a permanent loan which may be used for various purposes in the future, is of higher value than a short bond. Let it be distinctly stated, more distinctly if you choose by amendment than is now done, that the bonds are to be exempt from all income or other tax whatever. Let every guarantee of this kind be given, and what then? Why, we shall escape the very difficulties under which we now labor, and for the existence of which difficulties gentlemen have reasoned themselves to the conclusion that we cannot get money at a low rate of interest.

They say, "Look at your five-twenties payable in gold; look at your seven-thirties; look at your present securities in the market; who is going to exchange them for a security offering a lower rate of interest." Well, sir, if the five-twenties, for instance, were given to the world with the same express conditions which we here offer, if they were issued under a statutory provision that they should under no circumstances whatever be taxed by any authority, under a provision that they could not under any circumstances be redeemed, either principal or interest, in anything but gold, and if they had as long a time to run as these bonds have, I admit that no one would exchange them for these bonds at a lower rate of interest. But the difficulty is the uncertainty, the ambiguity, which under the law and the different interpretations given to it, surrounds now that class of security. Suppose, for instance, when the five-twenties were issued it had been explicitly, clearly, and unmistakably declared in the very terms of the law that not only the interest but the principal, whenever it became due, should be paid in coin; suppose it had been in like manner explicitly and unmistakably provided that they should be subject to no taxation whatever, either by State or municipal authority, does anybody suppose we would have had our present difficulty?

Mr. PILE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, from the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois I desire to state what I think may perhaps throw a little light on the trouble with our bonds. The Massachusetts bonds to which the gentleman alluded are a five per cent. bond, a sterling bond. The principal and interest are paid in sterling and paid in the city of London. It is a sterling bond at five per cent., and is three per cent. above par, while United States bonds at six per cent. in the same market are twenty-eight per cent. below par. What is the reason? It is not because the London market has any more faith in Massachusetts than it has in the United States, but it is because in the London market alone will that bond stay. The five-twenties are in that market, but the slightest political trouble on that side of the water sends them all back here, or the slightest commotion here sends them all back. A variation of a fraction of a per cent. between the price on the other side of the water and here sends $10,000,000 of them back here and throws them upon the market and takes $10,000,000 of gold back in the next steamer. Under these circumstances there can be no health in the currency or credit of the Government.

But let this Congress authorize a foreign loan, bonds payable at three and a half and four per cent. in sterling, the interest payable in London, or in the currency of Frankfort, and the interest payable there, and I have no doubt—indeed, I have assurances which are almost authoritative—that those bonds will be taken in Frankfort in just as many millions as you will authorize; that it will stay there during the whole term of the loan, and the funds received from it can be brought back here, and these funds that are subject to all manner of constructions, to all the fluctuations of political platforms and to all the fluctuations of trade between the countries, may be taken up and we be relieved of all these difficulties.

I never could understand any other reason except pride that prevented us from authorizing the creation of a foreign loan on these terms. There is no political commotion on that side that would send the bonds back here and draw specie out of the country, and no political commotion on this side that would have that effect. It would be a permanent loan there and relieved of all this question of taxation. It seems to me that ultimately, if we can come to the conclusion that it is best to submit to a foreign loan, it will be best to adopt some such policy.

As to the Massachusetts loan already alluded to, it is not seen in any market on this side of the water. We cannot find a single one of those bonds here. They are heard of nowhere except in the market of London, and there they stand to-day, although they pay but five per cent. interest, at three per cent. above par. I have no doubt that four per cent. Massachusetts bonds in the currency of Frankfort, and the interest payable there, would go to par at any moment; not because Massachusetts bonds would have an advantage over United States bonds, but from the fact that it would be payable there, the interest payable there. It would enter into the investments of those who seek for a permanent loan and a permanent loan only. It would be bought only by those who buy to keep and to keep it off from the market, and it would never be heard of on this side of the water until the day of its redemption came. I think that is the reason and the only reason of the difference between State bonds and United States bonds. It illustrates precisely the idea of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] although he was mistaken in the rate of interest.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew it pro forma. I should prefer fifty years, but that is not the point to which I wish to speak. I agree with my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] exactly. What we want is a bond at a rate of interest that will not come into the markets of this country. We need not make any foreign loan for that purpose, but by putting that at three and sixty-five hundredths, taking it out of all income and other taxes and giving it a long time, say fifty years, that would give it all the advantages which my colleague so well describes. It would then be a permanent loan which would not come back here, because we would not take it.

I agree, too, with the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE,] that it will be a long day, I trust a very long one, before there will be much money to be loaned at the West at three and sixty-five hundredths, because it can be occupied more profitably there in building railroads and villages and tilling the land.

But what will be the effect of this measure? It will draw money for these bonds from Frankfort, where it is now one and a half per cent.; from Vienna, where it is one and three-quarter per cent.; from London, where it is one and a half and two per cent., and bring it to this country for these great uses and benefits. And in doing that it will bring down the general rate of interest all over this country. So that instead of the rate of interest in the West being as it is now, eight, ten, and twelve per cent., it will be five and six per cent.

My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BENTON] says that these bonds will go abroad. I am content that they shall go abroad. There are $600,000,000 of our bonds abroad now at six per cent.; and we can send nearly $1,200,000,000 abroad for the same amount of interest that we are now paying on the $600,000,000. The reason why our bonds abroad are not any higher is because of two elements; first, they are liable to be paid; and secondly, they can be sent home here and realized at high rates in comparison with what they cost when purchased. Therefore they are the first things sold abroad to be sent home when their holders want money.

Now, what I would wish, looking at this matter as a financier and a legislator, is first, that there should be one class of consolidated funded securities, known of all men, known all over the world as the English consols are; secondly, that they shall bear such a rate of interest that we need not make a bad bargain should we desire to redeem them at the end of twenty-five years by purchase or otherwise; thirdly, that there should be such exact expression in the law that no man can have any doubt about its construction; and lastly, that they shall be free from all fluctuations hereafter from legislation.

I therefore shall move as soon as it is in order, unless some other member shall do so, to strike out of this bill all provisions for income or any other tax, and let this be simply a long gold bond at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest, free from all possible fluctuation.

One word in regard to this talk about our credit. There is no difficulty about the credit of this country. Whenever we make a promise, and that promise is free from all doubt, it is at a premium. Our gold certificates to-day: what are they but simply a promise of this Government to pay gold? And they are above par because they are beyond doubt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has made the same point that he made the other evening in regard to the difference between Massachusetts bonds and the bonds of the United States. I desire to call attention to the statement he has just made on that subject, that the chief difference after all is in the time of payment; that our bonds are sold at a low rate, because they are liable to be paid soon; and that a bond at a low rate of interest with a long time to run, is a great deal better, other things being equal, than a short bond at a higher rate of interest—in that, of course. I agree—and that this explains the chief difference between Massachusetts bonds and the bonds of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not say the "chief difference."

Mr. GARFIELD. One of the chief differences. After charging me with not knowing anything about the Massachusetts loan, the gentleman stated the other evening, as he has also done to-day, that the Massachusetts bonds reported in the sterling market in Threadneedle street, were very long bonds; and that our bonds having a very short time to run, the difference is against us. Now, I want to call attention to the Massachusetts bonds, which for a long time have been upon the exchange boards in London. I hold in my hand the report of the auditor of the State of Massachusetts for the year 1865; and in this document there are recorded but two sterling loans of the State of Massachusetts. One is known as the Western railroad sterling bonds, and amounts to about four million one hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars; the other is a smaller loan, known as the Troy and Greenfield railroad sterling bonds, amounting to about half a million dollars. These are all the sterling bonds set down in the official report of the State for 1865.

Now, Mr. Chairman, of the chief one of these sterling loans the last installment is payable in April 1, 1871, some of them being payable this year, some in 1869, a few in 1870, and the very last installment in 1871. So that at the date of this report in 1865, not one of those loans had more than six years to run; yet the five per cent. loans of the State of Massachusetts, during almost all that period, were worth almost double any United States six per cent. bond on the market. Even those which had more time to run than the Massachusetts bonds had. I hold, therefore, that it is the credit of the two loans rather than the time of maturity that makes the difference.

Now, sir, in the last number of the London Economist, to which I referred the other evening, the Massachusetts five per cent. loan, this old loan—for the new loan is not quoted on the boards, being owned and held mainly by the Barings—is quoted at ninety cents, which, in gold, adding the sterling exchange would make it nearly at par in gold; while in the same number of the Economist the five per cent. ten-forty bonds of the United States, payable, principal and interest, in gold, are quoted at sixty-eight and a half; twenty-one and a half cents on the dollar less in gold than the longest Massachusetts loan. Thus, though the difference of time was in favor of the United States securities, the difference of credit in favor of the Massachusetts makes her bonds worth twenty-one and a half cents on the dollar more than ours.

Mr. Chairman, no amount of time can cure bad credit. It is humiliating that a great nation like this shall so conduct its affairs as to fall so far below one of the States of the Union. Let us prove to the world that we intend to keep faith in all our obligations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In the first section strike out the following:

Twenty, thirty, and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at five per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Forty years, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum.

Mr. BROOKS. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out "forty" and inserting "ten." I am opposed to this amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I propose to vote against it, without intending to commit myself to the proposition which comes from the Senate.

We propose to issue a loan terminable in forty years, that is in the year 1908. We propose to fund over $2,000,000,000 of debt; and during all this time we pledge ourselves to pay a certain rate of interest. If the gentleman had fully reflected on this subject he would have seen that in the year 1908 there will be one hundred million people in this country, who will consume an enormous amount of importations of all kinds, and furnish the greatest capacity of taxation for all purposes. We propose now to commit ourselves to this amount of taxation for all that time. I have lived in my brief day to see the payment of one national debt. General Jackson, during his administration, discharged the whole debt of the revolution, as well as the debt of the war of 1812. It is within the memory of man that during the administration of General Jackson the three per cent. debt of the Revolution was paid, and that because of the large surplus fund in the Treasury. If my memory serves me, it was bought at or above par. The debt was comparatively small, and only at three per cent., and with few years to run, and then the country was young. Now, when the country is great in resources, and yearly growing greater, we are asked to commit the people to paying forty years upon this vast debt the sum of three and sixty-five hundredths or four per cent. interest. I will never make such a record. I will never commit my country to this for forty years, beyond my own life, and probably beyond the lives of my children. I hope no such record will be made. Ten years is as long as it should be made by this Congress. At a future session, with the general expanding of our resources, with our country more at peace, with no future so alarming, with no presidential election to settle, I should be willing to legislate as to time, but I think it is better now to pay five or six per cent., instead of mortgaging our countrymen through all time to pay three and sixty-five hundredths or four per cent. to foreign bondholders. In less than forty years we might be able to pay it, and if not able to pay it, still the credit of the country would be such, by reason of our growth in population and the development of our resources, as to put us in a better position to make better terms than now. Therefore it is that I am opposed to this proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JUDD. Whatever I may think, Mr. Chairman, of the reasons given by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] for his position, it is not quite certain I will not agree with him in his conclusions. Why is all this agitation at this time throughout the country? We have no debt but what has been paid when it is due; no one has any claim upon us, either foreign or domestic, but what the Government up to this hour has met. Why is it the country or the House is agitated on these financial questions? Why is it the entire time of this Congress is engaged in devising some means, some theory, by which they should fix and establish permanently a new policy on the part of the country. It grows first out of the uncertainty in the terms of the obligations we have issued; that is the first; and another cause operating strongly is the feeling in the country that capital is protected at the expense of labor. These two things operating together demand the matter should be met as statesmen. This Government of the United States must fix its policy in reference to the payment of interest and the tax it shall impose on its citizens. What shall that be? The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] says he is not prepared to commit to mortgage posterity. If in his reading—and it has been extensive—he has found a nation paying less interest than three and a half per cent. on a permanent loan, he has traveled more into the economy of loaning money than I have. But, sir, I have no fear that forty years at three and sixty-five hundredths will be a burden upon the resources of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have none of these fears of being mortgaged to foreign countries. My friend from Massachusetts indulges a little of that, and tells you he desires so to frame this bill that the loan shall stay at home. Why, Mr. Chairman, this country is a borrower as a whole. The old countries have money to lend. The analogy the gentleman gave between Illinois and Massachusetts is exactly the analogy between this country as a whole and European countries where surplus capital is to be had at a cheap rate of interest. Here capital is all in active employment; and when the gentleman from Massachusetts tells you that he believes the capital of the country is so much in want of employment in the legitimate course of business that $2,500,000,000 can be absorbed on behalf of the Government as an investment, I think there is an entire mistake in the calculation.

In relation to the bill before the committee, I am partially with the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] upon the question whether we are prepared at this time to act intelligently and understandingly. Why, sir, the bill as it came from the Senate struck me simply as a bill to engage in a broker's business. If it had provided that we would create a permanent debt at the rate of five, six, four, or three and a half per cent. interest and let the creditors come and exchange securities at the Treasury, there would have been something in that. But the Senate bill puts into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue $2,500,000,000 of indebtedness as he pleases. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I was going to propose to stop debate on this amendment. I will yield, however, a portion of my five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLA.] who has not been heard.

Mr. BLA. It seems to me the gentleman has not fully answered the question as to what has caused the public agitation at this time in regard to this matter of funding the debt. It seems to me it is more for this reason than for the one he has given that the Government being the great borrower and its bonds being exempt from taxation it has carried up the rate of interest which States and towns and the whole debtor portion of the community have had to pay. Now, if you can put your Government debt at a lower rate of interest your States, communities, and individuals will get the benefit of the reduction, and it will give an impetus to business and a relief from part of our taxation.

Now, I think the gentleman from New York is wrong in this particular. It is not only the Government debt that we have to take care of by taxation, but it is the State and local debts; and if you can reduce the interest on the Government debt, then the people will be able to take care of the local debt, and pay what would be a high rate of interest for the public debt twenty years hence very much better than they can now; because we shall have cleared off our State and local debts.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe I have a minute or two remaining, and as the gentleman from West Virginia desire to occupy a few minutes, I will give him what remains of my time.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I simply desire to reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS,] who asked me if I paid my debts by giving my notes. I ask him if he pays his debts by giving his notes, and if that is the doctrine of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. ROSS. Does not the gentleman pay his debts by giving greenbacks? That is the question. That is the way I pay mine, and I suppose he does the same, and I do not know that the bondholders have any better claim.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I do not owe the bondholders anything, nor I presume does the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROSS. Our constituents owe the bondholders.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I regard the United States as an individual, and I make this assertion: that the United States notes are not lawful money, and cannot be used as such for the payment of the debt of the nation by the United States. If I could have three minutes I could prove it. The law does not make any such provision.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to stop debate on this amendment and the amendments thereto. The motion was agreed to.

The committee informally rose.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co. and Peter Rosecrantz; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) for the relief of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon bills of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 382) granting an increase of pension to Obediah T. Plum;

An act (S. No. 422) granting a pension to Maria Schweitzer, and minor children of Conrad Schweitzer, deceased;

An act (S. No. 517) granting a pension to the widow and children of Henry Brown;

An act (S. No. 518) granting a pension to the widow and child of John P. Petty;

An act (S. No. 521) granting a pension to the children of William M. Wooten, deceased;

An act (S. No. 547) granting a pension to John Sheets;

An act (S. No. 175) for the relief of Joseph McGhee Cameron and Mary Jane Cameron, children of La Fayette Cameron, deceased;

An act (S. No. 314) for the relief of George T. Brien; and

An act (S. No. 383) granting a pension to John A. Weed and Elizabeth J. Weed, minor children of Robert T. Weed, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 604) regulating the times and places of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida; and

An act (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments; had agreed to the further conference asked by the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and had appointed Mr. CONKLING, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. McCREERY conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. VAN WYCK to print some remarks on the rights of American citizens abroad. [See Appendix.]

LEGAL EXPENSES—WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of February 11, a statement prepared in his office, and also of the chief of engineers and chief of ordnance, relative to the amounts paid for legal service from 1860 to 1863; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. KITCHEN on account of sickness in his family.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. CHANLER for the same reason.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed the consideration of the bill

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The question was taken on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, and it was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means was to strike out the words "the existing five per cent. bonds."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means was to insert after the word "certificates," in the same clause, the words "and debts past due or maturing before the end of the present fiscal year;" so that the clause will read:

And the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption or payment, at the option of the holder, or purchase of, or exchange for, an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States, other than the three per cent. certificates, and debts past due or maturing before the end of the present fiscal year, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all outstanding or existing obligations as limited herein, and no more.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means explain what debts that amendment refers to?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is now in the Treasury an amount of money applicable to and which we think ought to be applied to those debts that are already due, and those debts that will mature before the end of the fiscal year. We do not want to increase our bonded debt for that, and therefore we except them from the operation of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next and last amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to the first section was to strike out at the end of the section the words "but not to exceed $700,000,000 shall be of the issue redeemable in twenty years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE I now move to strike out the words "from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes," and to insert in lieu thereof "from all taxation whatever;" so that it will read "which said bonds shall be exempt from all taxation whatever."

Mr. Chairman, every law authorizing the issue of bonds passed since the Thirty-Seventh Congress has contained the language that they shall be exempt from taxation by or under State, municipal, or local authority. That language has been quoted against them in popular assemblies all over the country, and has placed Congress in the position of being liable to attack as exempting bonds from that character of taxation. Now, I wish to call the attention of gentlemen, and particularly of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, who, I have no doubt, have been accustomed to use this kind of argument, to the fact that not only are such bonds by the Constitution exempt from municipal taxation, but that according to the decision of the Supreme Court Congress has no authority to confer upon the States the right to tax them.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] a few minutes since suggested that this section conferred upon the States a right under certain circumstances to tax the bonds. I say that if it does confer such a right it is void. The Supreme Court, in the case of Van Allen vs. The Assessors, in 3 Wallace, gave an opinion that Congress had no right to empower the States to tax municipally or otherwise any securities issued by the General Government, and it was upon the ground of the opinion pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland that the securities of the General Government, issued of course for the purpose of carrying on the General Government, were so far above and beyond all State control that the States had no right to attempt in any way to paralyze any means that Congress should take to carry on the Government, and that Congress had no right to confer upon the States that power. That decision was not pronounced by any Republican upon the bench; nor was it pronounced by any of the recent converts to Democracy upon the bench. It was pronounced by that long-lived and well-known Democrat, Judge Nelson, of New York; and that decision sets at rest finally and completely all question of State or municipal taxation. So that hereafter in this country there can be no further discussion upon the propriety of municipal taxation of United States bonds. That being the case, I object that Congress shall, by the presumption contained in this bill, seem to arrogate to itself any power whatever over this question of municipal taxation. It having no such power, I do not wish it to attempt to exercise it. The House having by a large vote declared that these bonds shall run forty years and shall be at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest, I am willing for one to say further that there shall not only be no municipal taxation, but no national taxation, either by way of income tax or any other tax; and I would proclaim it to the world, so that if any of our creditors are willing to exchange our present securities for those which are provided by this bill, they may do so, and be subject to no taxation whatever.

Mr. PAINE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] because I am afraid it will fail to accomplish the purpose he has in view. The bill, as proposed to be amended by him, will then read, "Which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form whatever." Now, if the gentleman considers that form of language sufficient to accomplish the exclusion of all possible taxation of these bonds, it may be that local tribunals will entertain a different opinion of the language; because the very committee which drew this bill in the Senate, as well as the Senate itself, have put a different construction upon it, and if they have put a different construction upon it I do not think it will be surprising to find that State tribunals do.

If the gentleman will look a little further along in the bill he will find that when it is proposed to exempt not only the principal of these bonds but also the interest, or the income derived from them, from taxation by the Federal Government, with certain exceptions and limitations, a different phraseology is used.

The language is not that "these bonds shall be exempt from Federal taxation except in certain cases;" but it is that "these bonds and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes."

What I fear is this, that if the amendment of the gentleman shall prevail and the section shall finally assume that shape it will by some be construed to be an exclusion of taxation upon the principal of the bonds alone, leaving the income of the bonds to be taxed by State or local authorities and to be taxed specially and differently from other incomes by Federal authority.

Now, at the conclusion of my remarks I shall offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] which is to insert after the words "which said bonds" the words "and the interest thereon and the income therefrom;" so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

Which said bonds and the interest thereon and the income therefrom shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

I shall offer that as an amendment, and after it has been voted upon I will move to amend the other portion of the clause; so that the clause will read:

Which said bonds and the interest thereon and the income therefrom shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under national, State, municipal, or local authority.

I shall offer that as a separate amendment, for the reason that while I believe most of the members of this House, who are in favor of this bill or anything like it, are in favor of the first amendment I propose to offer, preventing any taxation by State, municipal, or local authorities, either upon the principal or the income or the interest, there may be a difference of opinion in this House upon one other point; that is, whether or not the Federal Government should be allowed to tax the income derived from these bonds as it taxes income derived from other sources. I am therefore inclined to offer my proposition as an additional amendment, because I believe the first will meet with no objection. I understand there are many in this House who are disposed to allow the national Government to tax income derived from these bonds just as the income derived from other bonds is taxed. For myself, I am opposed to that, because I believe it necessary to give up even this power in order to enable the Government to secure the redemption of the bonds now outstanding.

Mr. PIKE. I will modify my amendment so that it will, I think, satisfy the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] I move to amend by striking out the following:

Shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes—and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And the interest thereon and income therefrom shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Mr. PAINE. In view of the modification just proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] I will not offer the amendment which I had proposed to offer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I entirely agree that the language adopted in the amendment just proposed by the chairman of the committee is very much better than any form of words which has been proposed. But while I agree with my colleague, the chairman of the committee, that it would be better, when negotiating the loan, to make the rate of interest as certain as possible, so that there shall be no contingencies to be taken into consideration by the man who proposes to take our loan, so that he may know exactly what return he is to receive on his investment. While I agree to all this I desire to suggest to the committee that probably there will always be in this country, as there has been for the last four years, a feeling of opposition to any law exempting a particular class of citizens from taxation, and especially when the exempted class are capitalists. I know that these bonds are to be issued at a low rate of interest; but still there may be ground of complaint that while the laboring man is subjected to taxation, the capitalist holding these bonds is not required to pay even an income tax. Hence it seems to me it would be better to leave the exemption as stated in the original bill—an exemption of these bonds from all State taxation and from all national taxation except the general income tax. That tax, whatever its rate may be, assessed upon all incomes arising from property generally, should be imposed upon the income from the bonds as it now is. There should be at least this much of a concession to meet the popular demand which we know to exist on this subject. Let it be understood that this one tax on incomes shall apply equally to incomes from all sources, and that no other tax in any form whatever shall be imposed upon these bonds by any authority, State or national.

One word more. If there should ever be a time—and I hope it will come—when we shall have no income tax, then, as a matter of course, there would be no tax on these bonds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word in the seventeenth line, for the purpose of opposing the proposition made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] I entirely agree with what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has said with reference to the prejudice of the people upon this question of taxing the income on United States bonds. But, sir, there is a principle which I think rises above this question of the prejudice of the people. Whenever there comes a time of great public emergency, and it is necessary to tax the income of the people of the country—in a time of war or of great public peril—the bondholder deriving income from the public funds should pay the same tax upon his income as the man deriving income from any other source. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the rate of interest finally agreed upon with reference to these bonds I hope we shall make no provision which will place the bondholder above the man who may hold any other form of security. And besides, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe we have the power, the constitutional power, if we would. It would certainly raise the question whether, under the Constitution, that was a uniform system of taxation. In my judgment we must leave this question in the future as now, so that we can tax the incomes of the people from whatever source they may be derived. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine by which these loans are to be exempted from taxation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state a few historical facts which will answer the gentleman's argument. The first income tax in Great Britain was in 1798, and that lasted until 1816. Then that went out and there was no other income tax until 1842. If you take the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the rate of interest heretofore was a calculation for the income tax, and we are to give the bondholder the lowest rate of interest when there is no tax. I hope soon in this country to see no such thing as an income tax, and then this provision will not be wanted. As soon as we bring down the rate of interest, that most obnoxious of all taxes, the income tax, will not be needed. My friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says we cannot exempt them from tax because it would be unequal taxation. We tax some incomes ten per cent. and others five per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts believe it is within the power of Congress to tax one class of property one tax and another class of property a different tax, as an income tax? Is that a uniform income tax in the language of the Constitution?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not know anything in the Constitution about a uniform income tax. I know we have made the tax such as we pleased. We have taxed some incomes ten per cent., lower incomes five per cent., and still smaller incomes nothing at all. When we issued these bonds originally we taxed them only one and a half, while we taxed the other five per cent. What I desire is that the whole of our debt shall be consolidated and taken, as far as possible, out of the arena of political action, that it shall be taken from political platforms and made a business proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

Substitute the following:

And the interest thereon and income therefrom shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, except such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes, and exempt from all taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Mr. BENTON. I should like to inquire if these bonds are subject to a national income tax; whether the gentleman from Wisconsin holds it should be applicable to the foreign bondholder?

Mr. PAINE. I suppose a phraseology might be adopted which might tax all the bonds of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not desire to raise the question suggested here, nor is it raised by the amendment pending. I adopt precisely the language of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means with the single exception of putting in a clause exempting the income tax from the general provisions of the amendment. It makes this point: that whenever the Government of the United States finds it necessary to assess a tax on the income of its citizens it will also assess it upon the income of all citizens, and not upon industrial incomes alone, while it exempts those that arise from capital invested in bonds. I say now, as I said before, that, in my judgment, that single feature is the only thing that now prevents the clamor and opposition against our public debt from being overwhelming and irresistible. It is because one great feature of our system of taxation is that the proceeds of the bonds bear exactly the same burden as all our incomes on property and labor. I am unwilling we shall exclude that element from the present law. I therefore offer my amendment as a substitute, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. ROSS. I do not think any measure can be more unjust and odious than this proposition to exempt for forty years this entire debt from taxation. It is putting it beyond the reach of the people or their representatives, and is only carrying out the idea I enunciated in the start, that it is the object of the bondholders to get this debt outside of the reach of the people's representatives. Sir, the further we progress in the discussion of this subject the more apparent become the futile efforts of the bill now under consideration. The fact begins to impress itself upon members discussing this question that when you propose to these bondholders to take a bond bearing interest at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. instead of a five or six per cent. bond, they will turn round and laugh in your face. How do you expect to get a ten-forty bond, principal and interest payable in gold, converted into one drawing three and sixty-five hundredths per cent.? How do you expect to get five-twenty bonds converted into this kind of security when the former draw six per cent. in coin?

No, sir; you have not commenced in the proper way. I can make a suggestion to gentlemen which I think will enable them to extricate themselves from the dilemma in which they are placed. Let them first withdraw the $300,000,000 of national currency from the banks and supply them with greenbacks, thereby saving eighteen or twenty million dollars in gold to the tax-payers of the country. What then? Why, sir, I would commence paying off our debt. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] says we should manage our credit the same as a private individual would. I admit that principle. How would that be? Why, just as fast as his obligations became due he would meet them promptly. Now, a considerable amount of the five-twenty bonds are now due. Why not pay them? What reason is there that this Government should not pay them now, and do it in the same way that we pay our other creditors?

Mr. LYNCH. If the gentleman will allow me, he proposes to pay the bonds in greenbacks. Now, I would like to know what he proposes to pay the greenbacks in?

Mr. ROSS. Pay them in taxation; take them up by taxation. I say that we can save $18,000,000 per annum by withdrawing the national currency and furnishing greenbacks. Can any man doubt that?

A MEMBER. Cannot you save the whole?

Mr. ROSS. If this is done then I would commence paying off the five-twenties in greenbacks, and thus maintain our credit and our honor by being found in the discharge of our debt. When the amount of greenbacks is reduced to the extent of eight or ten hundred millions, I would make provision for funding the loans into a two and a half or three per cent. bonds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I regret that the confusion around me prevented me from hearing distinctly the argument of the gentleman. I have always listened to him with interest ever since he made the proposition to pay the public debt in greenbacks and for burning greenbacks as they came in from taxes or otherwise. That proposition was made here in a controversy between the gentleman and his colleague.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to see the gentleman get somebody to take these bonds.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot agree with my friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON], and my friend from my own State, [Mr. GARFIELD], in calling upon us to legislate because of what they themselves call prejudice and clamor.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg the gentleman will not say that I propose to legislate because of prejudice or clamor. I legislate on principle, as did the chairman of the committee when he reported this provision.

Mr. SCHENCK. Exactly; then I will acquit the gentleman from Iowa. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] certainly spoke of listening to the prejudices of the people.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will not be interrupted and lose all my five minutes. The gentleman from Iowa certainly spoke of the clamor of the people upon this subject, or of some part of the people as a reason for taking a particular course. Sir, I want to legislate and address myself to the good sense of the people, and I tell you that the people of the United States have vastly more clear comprehension of these questions than many gentlemen attribute to them.

Now, what do we propose? We say to the people, "Are you not willing to allow your legislative department to agree to the issue of bonds at a low rate of interest, three and sixty-five hundredths per cent., if they can obtain money at that price for your use and for paying off your present debt, and in consideration of their letting you have the money at so low a rate release those who advance the money from all taxation of every kind whatever?" Will you think it any argument to say that it is unjust and unfair? Why, what would the bondholder be entitled to say? He says, "I gave up my seven-thirty or five-twenty bond, bearing six per cent. interest in gold, because of the superior guarantee and pledge of security given in these long bonds at a low rate of interest, and thus I paid you my income tax and all other taxes in advance. I came to you and offered to take your securities at half as much as you were paying, and in doing it I solemnly agreed with you that I would contract, in lieu of the taxes that might afterward be imposed upon me, to virtually satisfy all those taxes in advance by taking the bonds." Put that proposition to the people, and I tell you the people of the United States will understand it. I tell you that if you legislate in that way you address the understandings of people capable of comprehending this matter, and if after you have got securities of that kind out paying only three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest upon them, any man or any party attempting to raise a clamor and excite prejudice by saying that you let these people off from taxation, the people will understand as well as you can that this whole thing was fairly and squarely settled in the original contract that was made with those who advanced their money and took the securities.

My doctrine, therefore, is, in legislating on this subject, not to consider prejudice, not to consider clamor, not to consider demagogism, let it come from any quarter, but to do that which is fair and right and a good bargain and trust to the shrewd people of the United States to understand that it is a good bargain that you have made for them and I do not mistake their comprehension, I am sure, when I say that they have just as much sagacity, the great body of them, as any of us on this floor in regard to matters of this kind. Their interest has whetted their perspicacity on this subject of late, and they have looked into the matter pretty closely all over the country, and they will be well satisfied to let people off paying taxes if they can get rid of the seven-thirty bonds and bonds paying six per cent. in gold and substitute in lieu of those bonds, even if no tax is paid, bonds that will draw from their pockets hereafter only three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum in the payment of interest. I now ask unanimous consent to close debate on this section.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to offer a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. That will still be in order.

No objection was made; and all debate on the amendment was closed.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD's substitute for Mr. PIKE's amendment, and it was disagreed to—ayes twenty-seven, noes not counted.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. PIKE, to strike out the words—

Shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes; and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the interest thereon, and the income therefrom shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes 48.

Before the result was announced, Mr. RAUM and Mr. ALLISON called for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were eleven in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being not one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The amendment of Mr. PIKE was accordingly agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I now move the amendment of which I have given notice, to strike out the amendment just adopted on motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE], together with the words "which said bonds," immediately preceding it, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Which said bonds shall be liable to taxation by or under State, municipal, or local authority to the same extent as money is taxed under such State, municipal, or local authority, and no greater.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order. The amendment of the gentleman is practically to strike out what the committee has just inserted. It is true he proposes to strike out additional words "which said bonds;" but he moves to insert those very words again, in the very place they now occupy. I therefore hold that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must sustain the point of order, and rule the amendment out of order in its present form.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I will modify my amendment by substituting the word "obligations" for the word "bonds."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to undertake to do by law that which the Supreme Court of the United States has decided cannot be constitutionally done?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot decide that it is not in order for Congress to pass any law.

Mr. NIBLACK. This amendment does not affect existing bonds. I concede that under the decision of the Supreme Court we cannot tax existing bonds. But we propose to make a new contract and to substitute other bonds for those now outstanding. I hold it is competent for Congress to enact a provision of this sort if it sees proper to do so. If this bill shall contain a clause that these new bonds shall be exempt from taxation, then I concede that the local authorities cannot tax them. But the cases to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] referred a short time ago do not sustain the claim which he makes upon them. They only go to the question that when Congress declares that certain bonds or agencies of the Government shall be exempt from taxation, then the State authorities shall not tax them. Now, I hold that under those very decisions, especially the decision in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, if Congress shall authorize these bonds to be taxed, it will then be perfectly competent for the State authorities to do so. I insist that is the true interpretation of the decision to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman allow me to read an extract from that decision?

Mr. NIBLACK. Not at present. At all events, this question has never been raised in this form. I venture the prediction—you may call it clamor, or what you will—that the public mind of this country will never rest satisfied so long as so large a portion of the available means of this country are exempted from local taxation as are invested in these bonds. And as we are now providing for funding all that class of bonds, I think it is a good time to settle this question. I propose this amendment in good faith, with the declaration that I will not vote for any bill that will exempt these bonds from taxation beyond the extent to which money is liable to taxation. I now yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. PIKE. I desire merely to read one passage from the decision of Judge Nelson, in the case of Van Allen vs. The Assessors, in 3 Wallace, page 385:

"It is said that Congress possesses no power to confer upon a State authority to be exercised which has been exclusively delegated to that body by the Constitution, and, consequently, that it cannot confer upon a State the sovereign right of taxation; nor is a State competent to receive a grant of any such power from Congress. We agree to this. But as it respects the subject-matter over which Congress and the States may exercise a concurrent power, and from the exercise of which Congress, by reason of its paramount authority, may exclude the States, there is no doubt Congress may withhold the exercise of that authority and leave the States free to act. An example of this relation existing between the Federal and State governments is found in the pilot laws of the States, and the health and quarantine laws. The power of taxation under the Constitution as a general rule, and as has been repeatedly recognized in adjudged cases in this court, is a concurrent power. The qualifications of the rule are the exclusion of the States from the taxation of the means and instruments employed in the exercise of the functions of the Federal Government."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. AXTELL. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the fact that it has uniformly been found necessary to insert in all the bills proposed a provision that these bonds shall be exempt from taxation implies that without such a provision the bonds might be taxed by State and municipal authority. We propose now to take up our debt voluntarily, and there is no gentleman on this side of the House who proposes to tax the bonds contrary to existing law; but, in order to make taxation equal, which is a more important question to the taxpayer than the amount of taxes, we propose to allow the new bonds that are to be issued to be taxed as all other property is taxed, or as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] justly says, as money is taxed in the respective States. This should be done, not because of any "popular clamor" on this subject, but because it is just and right. Frequently a man holding money in bank or otherwise at the time of the assessment for State and county taxation converts that money into bonds with the privilege of selling them back again in a few days after the assessor has gone his rounds, and thus the property escapes taxation. A gentleman in my own State who owns a mine or a farm or a block of buildings worth $100,000, pays his tax upon that much property to the State or to the county, and also pays his income tax upon his rents or upon the profits of his mine; but if he sells his property and puts it into United States bonds he escapes taxation.

Now, sir, while it may have been necessary at the time these bonds were issued that the Government should hold out this inducement of exemption from taxation in order to obtain money, we propose hereafter to avoid the issue of such bonds exempt from State and county taxation; and I warn the members of this House that it will not do to make these bonds a favored kind of property. We cannot force people to part with their bonds without repudiating our debt; and it seems to me, as has already been well said, that we cannot pay these bonds in greenbacks unless we first agree to pay the greenbacks and bring them up to where they ought to be, at par; and then it would be a matter of no consequence how the bonds were paid. But, sir, we must not, in issuing these new bonds, continue this favoritism to the holders of the bonds. We must allow them to be taxed as all other property is taxed; and then the burden of taxation will fall equally upon the owners of every species of property.

We are not now under the pressure of war, and there is no necessity of that kind for exempting these bonds from taxation. We are proposing to adopt means by which to reduce the amount of interest on our national indebtedness by pledging the faith of the Government that we will give to those investing in our securities a bond which shall certainly be paid in a given currency and not be taxed by the United States. In this form the bond would be sufficiently desirable to the holder without exempting it from local taxation.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to move the following as a substitute for the pending section:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations not less than $100 as he may prescribe, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after twenty, thirty, and forty years respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at five per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.; which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States; and the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used in exchange for an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States other than the three per cent. certificates and debts past due or maturing before the present fiscal year, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all outstanding or existing obligations as limited herein, and no more; but not exceeding $700,000,000 shall be redeemable at any one time.

I suppose this substitute cannot be voted on until the section shall be perfected, and I propose to reserve what I have to say upon the question until the proposition can come up in regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I regret very much that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has deemed it his duty to introduce this proposition. While I fully agree with what has been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] as to the point of the decision in 3 Wallace, that it is utterly incompetent for the Congress of the United States to confer upon any State of this Union the power of taxation of United States securities, I desire to go still further and say that it is utterly incompetent for the Congress of the United States to surrender the power vested in it to protect the national securities against any sort of intervention on the part either of States or of local municipalities.

I desire to call the attention of the House, Mr. Chairman, to the logic of the great decision in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, to which reference has been made; that is, it is essential to the self-preservation of the nation, that with or without reservation by act of Congress, these securities must be protected from any interference by either State or municipal authority. Having said this much, Mr. Chairman, I may be pardoned in saying it is the conviction of my own mind that the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] is a proposition simply to make secession and treason in this country easy, and not only so but inevitable. The power of taxation in a State is an original power. It is of the reserved powers of the State subject to the limitations of the Constitution only, and where ever they may assert it at all they may assert it to the exclusion of every dollar of property in the possession of the citizen. But, sir, for the protection of American nationality, I desire to say no State can under the Constitution rightfully impose one farthing of tax upon the national securities, for the reason that the protection of the national securities for the national defense against State intervention is essential to national existence. Yet the gentleman challenges us. I challenge him, sir, to say whether, when this nation has under the Constitution borrowed money for the national defense and issued its bonds for its repayment, a State may intervene and render those bonds useless?

Mr. AXTELL. Was not the doctrine of these decisions this: that the State ought not to tax the property of the United States above the United States rate of taxation?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; the decision, the reasoning of Marshall is, that they cannot tax the securities of the nation. It is capable of mathematical demonstration, I think, that the State cannot interpose its original power of taxation against the right of sovereignty to borrow money and issue bonds for its repayment. The State cannot annihilate the power of the nation to defend itself, for money is the sinews of war. You cannot sustain armies in the field, you cannot sustain navies upon the sea without money; and your Constitution having wisely provided that for the common defense Congress shall have power to borrow money, and having the power to borrow it it has the power to protect the bond which it issues for its repayment against every power on God's earth. I denounce the proposition, sir, as a proposition in favor of future rebellion, backed by the authority of a State, and as in favor of secession and the repudiation of our national securities. I for one invoke the opportunity to record the vote by yeas and nays on such a proposition as this.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio wants the vote taken on this proposition by yeas and nays. I am not afraid of the proposition. I am not afraid to stand by it here or anywhere else. And I will make another remark. No political party can stand long in this country that opposes equal taxation. We are not to be scared by clamor about treason. That is a convenient method of disposing of the equalization of taxation on the part of certain gentlemen here to which unfortunately the gentleman from Ohio belongs. It is a plain practical business question, and it has nothing to do with loyalty or disloyalty, secession or the concentration of power in the hands of the Federal Government. It is a question of justice. It is simply that the bonds shall be taxed as money is taxed, as the article which buys them is taxed, as the article to which the gentleman refers to as one of the sinews of war is taxed. I cannot, for my life, see the injustice of taxing bonds which represent money, while we tax the money which purchases them. But I do not read the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, to which the gentleman refers, as he reads it. In that case the principle is laid down that the power of taxation, where the Constitution and laws are silent on the subject, is concurrently exercised both by the Federal and State authority.

Mr. AXTELL. Allow me a single question. These bonds belonged to the United States. They sold them to individuals. What is the difference between them as regards taxation when the Government owned them and when the individual owns them?

Mr. NIBLACK. I insist that the exemption of these bonds from taxation rests upon the authority of Congress alone, and the Constitution has nothing to do with it except so far as it may be held by the courts as applicable to a particular class of property. In the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland it was decided that when certain property was declared exempt from taxation by Federal authority the State could not tax it. I concede that to be the law of this country. But it was not there decided that when Congress conferred upon the State authority to tax certain property it might not do so within the terms of the law conferring the power. Now, I do not propose to confer that power, but simply to limit taxation. And as money is taxed, what injustice there is in that I cannot apprehend.

Mr. PIKE. You cannot tax greenbacks.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman says you cannot tax greenbacks. Upon that there has been no express provision that I know of.

Mr. PIKE. The statute of the United States says so expressly.

Mr. NIBLACK. In some of the States they do tax them.

Mr. KERR. The supreme court of Indiana has decided that greenbacks may be taxed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was going to remark that the circuit court in my State decided some time ago that greenbacks might be taxed, and I learn from the newspapers that the supreme court of the State have decided that they are taxable like every other kind of property. If so, why should not, with much greater propriety, the interest-bearing bonds be taxed?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask for a vote on this amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will my colleague yield to me to make a short reply to the statement just made?

Mr. SCHENCK. This is an important debate, and I will move that the committee rise. It is now near five o'clock, and I propose when the committee rise to ask for an evening session to-night for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the special order under consideration, being Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MEMBERS-ELECT FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to present the credentials of the following members-elect from the State of Louisiana: J. H. Sypher, from the first district; James Mann, from the second district; J. P. Newham, from the third district; and Michael Vidal, from the fourth district. I move that they be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The credentials were accordingly referred to the Committee of Elections.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DAWES also presented a certified copy of the action of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, ratifying the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution; which was referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. MAYNARD, the action of the Legislature was ordered to be printed in the Globe, as follows:

Joint resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Whereas the Congress of the United States has adopted a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, and to be known as article fourteenth of said Constitution, as follows:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State being twenty-one years of age and citizen of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall be as to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any civil or military position under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of persons and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection and rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debts or obligations incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave, but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

Passed June 13, 1866.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the said constitutional amendment in manner and form as proposed and submitted by the Congress of the United States be, and the same is, on the part of the State of Louisiana, hereby ratified and accepted.

Adopted in General Assembly at the city of New Orleans, this 9th day of July, A. D. 1868.

CHAS. W. LOWELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

OSCAR J. DUNN,

Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.

Approved this 9th day of July, A. D. 1868:

H. C. WARMOTH,

Governor of the State of Louisiana.

A true copy on file in this office:

GEO. E. BOVEE,

Secretary of State.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 175) for the relief of Joseph

McGhee Cameron and Mary Jane Cameron, children of Lafayette Cameron, deceased;

An act (S. No. 314) for the relief of George T. Brien;

An act (S. No. 382) granting an increase of pension to Obadiah T. Plum;

An act (S. No. 383) granting a pension to John A. Weed and Elizabeth J. Weed, minor children of Robert F. Weed, deceased;

An act (S. No. 422) granting a pension to Maria Schweitzer and the children of Conrad Schweitzer, deceased;

An act (S. No. 517) granting a pension to the widow and children of Henry Brown;

An act (S. No. 518) granting a pension to the widow and child of John P. Fetty;

An act (S. No. 521) granting a pension to the children of William M. Wooten, deceased; and

An act (S. No. 547) granting a pension to John Sheets.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. PERHAM to withdraw from the files of the House the papers of Edward Johnson, an adverse report having been made thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the House to pass a little pension bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it the same bill which the gentleman brought up before to-day?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I must insist that it shall take the same course as other bills have taken. Let it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with the right to report it at any time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object to the reporting back at any time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I object to everything out of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose that we shall have a meeting to-night at half past seven o'clock to resume the consideration of the funding bill, and do no other business; or in other words, that the evening session to-night be devoted to the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. MYERS. I move to amend by adding, and the tariff bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think we can get through both bills to-night.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to the tariff bill being taken up after we are through the other bill.

Mr. MULLINS. We have got more in hand now than we can get through with to-night.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we might go on with the tariff bill when we get through the funding bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will allow the amendment to be offered, and then if we should finish the funding bill to-night—which is not very probable—the committee may take up the tariff bill, but no other business is to be done.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Can a call of the House be had under that order?

The SPEAKER. Of course, if a quorum should fail to be in attendance and the committee should rise, there might be a call of the House to secure a quorum to enable the committee to resume the consideration of the bill.

The question was taken on Mr. MYERS's amendment; and there were—ayes 54, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK's motion was then agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to give notice that if I find we are without a quorum I shall move a call of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask to be excused from attendance on the session of this evening on account of indisposition.

There was no objection, and the gentleman was excused.

By unanimous consent, Mr. PAINES was also excused from attendance on the evening session on account of indisposition.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and resumed, in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BROOMALL in the chair,) the consideration of Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of the bill is under consideration, and the pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word on the pending amendment, for the purpose of putting on record the opinions of one of the very ablest lawyers who ever lived in this country on the question of the right of Congress to authorize a State to tax the bonds of the United States. I had occasion two years ago, in a speech on this subject, to quote this passage from Mr. Webster.

But, before quoting that extract, I wish to state the authorities upon this subject. I take it that no lawyer in this House who has examined the authorities will assert that any State can of its own right tax the bonds of the United States. But the question has been raised whether Congress may not confer upon a State the right to tax them. I particularly desire to call attention on that question to the authorities to which I refer.

First, let me state in brief what are the authorities of the Supreme Court on the question of whether a State has the right to tax the bonds of the United States. It was decided by Chief Justice Marshall, in 1819, in the case of McCullough vs. The State of Maryland, (4 Wheaton, 316.) It was decided again by that same distinguished jurist in the case of Weston vs. The City of Charleston, (2 Peters, 449.) It was decided in the case of Osborn vs. The United States Bank, (9 Wheaton, 739,) in 1824, when Henry Clay, as counsel, argued other features of the cause before that court, but declined to offer any argument on the question of the power of the State to tax the bank, and alleged as a reason that the point was so well settled that argument was unnecessary. It was decided again in 1862, in the case of The Bank of Commerce vs. New York, (2 Black, 620.) And still later in the case of Van Allen vs. The Assessors, (8 Wallace, 585.)

Now, in regard to the power of Congress to authorize a State to tax the bonds of the United States, I ask the Clerk to read a passage from a speech of Daniel Webster's on the very question under discussion. It was delivered in the Senate of the United States, May 23, 1832.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Moore, of Alabama, proposing, first, that the bank shall not establish or continue any office of discount or deposit, or branch bank, in any State, without the consent and approbation of the State; second, that all such offices and branches shall be subject to taxation according to the amount of their loans and issues, in like manner as other banks or other property shall be liable to taxation.

"Mr. Webster spoke as follows: Now, sir, I doubt exceedingly our power to adopt this amendment, and I pray the deliberate consideration of the Senate in regard to this point.

"In the first place, let me ask, what is the constitutional ground on which Congress created this corporation, and on which we now propose to continue it? There is no express authority to create a bank or any other corporation given to us by the Constitution. The power is derived by implication. It has been exercised, and can be exercised only on the ground of a just necessity. It is to be maintained, if at all, on the allegation that the establishment of a national bank is a just and necessary means for carrying on the Government and executing the powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution. On this ground Congress has established this bank, and on this it is now proposed to be continued. It has already been judicially decided that Congress having established a bank for these purposes, the Constitution prohibits the States from taxing it. Observe, sir, it is the Constitution, not the law, which lays this prohibition on the States. The charter of the bank does not declare that the State shall not tax it. It says not one word on that subject. The restraint is imposed not by Congress, but by a higher authority, the Constitution.

"Now, sir, I ask how we can relieve the States from this constitutional prohibition? It is true that this prohibition is not imposed in express terms, but it results from the general provisions of the Constitution, and has been judicially decided to exist in full force. This is a protection, then, which the Constitution of the United States, by its own force, holds over this institution, which Congress has deemed necessary to be created in order to carry on the Government. So soon as Congress, exercising its own judgment, has chosen to create it, can we throw off from this Government this constitutional protection? I think it clear we cannot. We cannot repeal the Constitution. We cannot say that every power, every branch, every institution, and every law of this Government shall not have all the force, all the sanction, and all the protection which the Constitution gives it."

Mr. GARFIELD. Such was the opinion of the great "Defender of the Constitution." He believed that the power of a State to tax the securities of the United States is prohibited by a higher authority than a statute of Congress; that it is prohibited by the Constitution itself.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. NIBLACK.

Mr. NIBLACK. As the committee is not full, and I have no desire to break up the committee by calling for a division upon my amendment, I ask consent that it be reserved for a vote after the rest of the bill has been considered.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. POMEROY.) If no objection is made the amendment will be reserved in order to allow a vote upon it hereafter.

No objection was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the substitute for the section moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask that that also be reserved for a vote hereafter.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to ask that the privilege be reserved on the part of my colleague on the committee [Mr. LOGAN] to move an amendment hereafter; so that the section will read:

And the said bonds shall be exclusively used for the redemption of or in exchange for an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt, &c.

No objection was made.

No further amendment was offered to the first section.

The second section was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there is hereby appropriated out of the duties derived from imported goods the sum of $135,000,000 annually, which sum during each fiscal year shall be applied to the payment of the interest and to the reduction of the principal of the public debt, in such a manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, or as Congress may hereafter direct; and such reduction shall be in lieu of the sinking fund contemplated by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of Ways and Means was to strike out the words "in such a manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, or as Congress may hereafter direct."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means was to strike out the word "contemplated" and insert the word "provided" after the words "in lieu of the sinking fund."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of Ways and Means propose to amend by inserting a new section, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the holder of any lawful money of the United States to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple of fifty dollars, may convert the same into bonds for an equal amount, authorized by the first section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That such conversion shall not be allowed at any time when the amount of United States notes outstanding is reduced to $300,000,000. And any holder of any of the bonds provided for in the first section of this act may present the same to the Treasurer of the United States and demand lawful money of the United States for the principal and accrued interest thereon, and the Treasurer shall redeem the same in lawful money of the United States, unless the United States notes then outstanding shall amount to $400,000,000; and such bonds shall not be redeemable after the United States have resumed the payment of coin for their notes.

Mr. PIKE. I cannot allow this amendment to pass without at least making my protest against it. I oppose it because it is a direct allowance of an increase of United States notes. The present limit is $356,000,000. This amendment proposes to allow an increase of $44,000,000. For one, I will under no circumstances be willing to allow, if my vote can prevent it, an increase of the quantity of United States notes. A sufficient quantity is already issued; and the effort in my judgment should be upon all occasions to diminish the amount of currency until we can reach specie payments. The effect of this section will be this: whenever money is tight and in demand, whenever it is worth more than the bonds, the latter can be taken to the Treasury of the United States and money obtained for them until the amount of United States notes reaches $400,000,000. Thus you increase the volume of the currency from $356,000,000 to $400,000,000. Now, sir, I for one believe that in a time of peace we have not the slightest right in the world to issue legal-tender notes. When the issue of these legal tenders was authorized under the act of February 25, 1862, the opinion generally expressed upon this floor was that only as a war measure could the issue of those notes be justified.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have drawn an amendment which I think may obviate the objection of the gentleman. It is to add at the end of the section the following:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize an increase of United States notes.

Mr. PIKE. That obviates a part of the difficulty, but only a part.

Mr. BROOMALL. I would suggest that the same result can be better reached by striking out in line fifteen the words "four hundred" and inserting "three hundred and fifty-six."

Mr. PIKE. That would much better accomplish the object.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then I move that amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MULLINS. I desire to inquire what amount of greenbacks is now authorized by law?

Mr. BROOMALL. Three hundred and fifty-six millions.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this whole provision which it is proposed to incorporate as a new section. I believe with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] that it is desirable that the quantity of legal-tender notes in the country shall be reduced rather than increased. One of the objections which struck me on giving a general examination to this bill was that it seemed to be aiming at increasing the legal-tender circulation instead of reducing it. It appears to me to look toward abandoning the idea of returning to specie payments.

Now, sir, I believe—and I had supposed that this had grown to be the general belief—that our legislation ought to aim toward the earliest possible resumption of specie payments; that we look to a sound, convertible currency; but I find, sir, in this section the introduction of a policy which proposes to inflate the currency and increase the amount of legal-tender notes. I have not yet heard any explanation what the idea of the committee is;

and I cannot understand anything from this section and the amendments proposed to this bill. I believe there is no power in Congress to issue such a currency at all. It was not claimed at the time this policy was adopted upon any other ground than that of necessity. It is a policy at war with sound principles in relation to currency. Upon what principle is it anybody now proposes to increase this legal-tender currency? What is the occasion for it? What do gentlemen propose to gain by it? What do they mean to say to the country is the reason for it?

I wish to say, as has been remarked in this discussion, that these small notes, or rather small bonds provided for in this bill will circulate as currency to a considerable extent. I regret this. In fact, sir, the sum of it all is that I should regret any legislation which looked in the direction of increasing our irredeemable currency at all. I am in favor of going in the opposite direction. I am in favor of the resumption of specie payments. I think the country expects it and regards it as the wiser policy. I hope this section will not be adopted. The amendment is not material one way or the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on Mr. BROOMALL's amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope it will not be adopted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. PIKE. This is an important matter. It is to inflate the currency. Let us have tellers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will if the gentleman will renew it again, or give me an opportunity to renew it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well. I will propose $3,999,000 for the purpose of making a remark. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has confused the number of United States Treasury notes out with the number authorized. There were $450,000,000 United States Treasury notes authorized—$50,000,000 for a specific purpose—leaving $400,000,000, and of that $400,000,000, $356,114,212 were outstanding on the 1st of June. They are still under the law authorizing the issue. The law authorized the emission of that number of notes, and this is not an extension nor an inhibition. If they are not authorized by law to the amount of $400,000,000 of course there is nothing in this section which authorizes it. Nothing, therefore, is more unnecessary than the provision proposed. I desire to say in reference to the history of this legislation what took place in the Senate. This section was in the original bill of the Senate. In a thin Senate by a majority of two votes it was lost. It was stricken from the bill. I have every reason to believe if restored by the House there will be a decided majority in the Senate for retaining it. That, however, is not for the consideration of the House, which must vote on the proposition itself.

Referring to the law of the 30th of June, 1864, I find the limitation is in these words:

"Provided, That the total amount of bonds and Treasury notes authorized by the first and second sections of this act shall not exceed $100,000,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore issued; nor shall the total amount of United States notes, issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan; nor shall any Treasury note bearing interest, issued under this act, be a legal tender in payment or redemption of any notes issued by any bank, banking association, or banker, calculated or intended to circulate as money."

Thus the restriction was to $400,000,000, with an addition of $50,000,000 for the temporary loan, and since the redemption of the latter there is no authority of law for the addition of $50,000,000.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask the gentlemen this question: how, if the Government had no power to issue more than $350,000,000, is it going on redeeming up to $400,000,000?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is begging the question. I hold that a proper construction of the law authorizes the issue of $400,000,000.

Mr. BROOMALL. And the reissue of those that have been canceled by authority of law?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is a question of construction.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] to what I am about to say. I understand him to offer his amendment because there is no power under existing law to increase the issue of United States notes. Now, I join issue with him upon that question. I claim that under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury cannot only issue $400,000,000 of United States notes, but he can issue $450,000,000; because there is authority under the law of June 30, 1864, to issue $400,000,000, and also authority, under a more recent statute, to issue an additional $50,000,000, for the purpose of redeeming the temporary loan. During the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress we authorized an additional temporary loan of $50,000,000, three per cent. certificates, so that it is within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to-day to exercise that discretion, and issue not only $400,000,000, but $450,000,000 in addition for the redemption of the temporary loan.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I think my friend is mistaken. The temporary loan contemplated by the act he refers to did then exist as such, but since then it has all been redeemed. Therefore there is no authority to issue an additional $50,000,000. The law of last year authorized the issue of three per cent. certificates to redeem the compound-interest notes. We have called that a temporary loan, but it is not so denominated in the law.

Mr. ALLISON. I may be mistaken. Of course it depends upon the proper construction of the language of the law; but I do not think it is very material, as I understand the committee has already passed section two, which authorizes and directs, if I understand it properly, the Secretary of the Treasury to appropriate $135,000,000 in gold annually; first to the payment of the interest on the public debt, and secondly, to the redemption of the principal. So that by the adoption of the second section we require the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem any outstanding funded obligations of the Government in gold, because he is required to apply the moneys received from duties on imports to the redemption of the public debt; and therefore it seems to me he is required to redeem the five twenties that have already matured, to wit: those that were issued in 1862 in gold. I was not in when that section was passed; but I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that it requires, unless it has been amended, the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the five-twenties of 1862 in gold. It may be that it ought to be done, but I desired to offer an amendment to the section which we require the Secretary to apply a portion of that $135,000,000, not applicable to the payment of interest on the public debt, to purchase of United States bonds, which are only quoted at 112 to-day, in United States notes instead of redeeming them in coin. Now, of course, everything depends upon the class of loans we put out under this bill. If we put out a loan at three and sixty-five hundredths interest, then I think no harm can result to the country by the convertible provision of this bill. But if we put out a bond at a greater rate of interest than that the effect of this bill will be to reduce the amount of greenbacks or United States notes in circulation, because no one will convert these bonds again into United States notes when they are worth more than greenbacks would be.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw it.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to strike out "four hundred" and insert "three hundred and fifty-six;" so that the clause will read:

And the Treasurer shall redeem the same in lawful money of the United States unless the United States notes then outstanding shall amount to $356,000,000.

I entirely disagree with the gentleman from Iowa as to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury under existing law to issue more legal tenders. He was authorized to issue $400,000,000 upon one occasion. That was done, and that power was exhausted. He was authorized to issue $50,000,000 upon another. That was done, and that power was exhausted. Some of the $400,000,000 have been canceled pursuant to existing laws which are now suspended, and the law remains just as it was, just as it would have been if his power had been limited under the original act to $356,000,000.

Now, I offer this amendment because I am entirely opposed to any increase of the irredeemable currency of the country. My own belief is that it would have been better for the country and the people to have commenced redeeming the legal tenders immediately upon the fall of the rebellion, if it had to be done by borrowing at almost any rate of per cent. in Europe rather than to continue the evil until now. But that cannot be done, and the most that we can hope at this time is to prevent further increase.

I rather like this section, because it proposes to give an elasticity to the currency which our present currency unfortunately lacks on account of its being limited to this country alone. I agree that it is best to allow those who have more than they need of it to invest it in bonds, and to reconvert it at will if there should not be a further increase of legal-tender currency. I trust the committee will agree with me that it is about time we had put a stop to all talk of further increase. It is that that produces uncertainty in all dealings in the country and contributes very largely toward that depression that exists too frequently in various quarters. If we can only prevent increase, and fix up some means by which the amount shall be reduced and specie payment gradually approached, we will have done a great thing for the country. I think the vote upon this question will test for the country whether the Fortieth Congress is willing to go on in this inflation of the currency. If it is, then I for one will have little faith in any of the obligations of the United States, because continued inflation must undoubtedly result in this country as it has in all countries in the world, in not only repudiation of the currency but repudiation of the entire debt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I oppose the amendment for the purpose of saying that I am opposed to the section. In the first place, the proposition in this section enables any combination that can command $50,000,000 at will to reduce the circulation to $800,000,000 or to increase it to $400,000,000 within twenty-four hours, a power that ought not to be given to any one. But I object to this section furthermore that it is converting non-interest-bearing notes into an interest-bearing debt; it is converting our greenbacks into bonds. So long as we are to have an irredeemable currency, United States notes, greenbacks are the best currency, the most popular currency that we have ever had or ever will have. I am in favor of retaining it. I am opposed to the whole provision of this bill. It is reversing altogether the principles of our financial policy from the beginning, which was to keep our debt subject to our own control; hence the five-twenty, ten-forty bonds. This bill proposes to make a debt upon the country of between two and three billion dollars, running forty years, at a rate of interest which now indeed seems low, but which is larger than that paid by the British nation, and which, before half the forty years have elapsed, will be regarded in this country as burdensome.

I here present to the committee the views of Mr. Jefferson on the subject of extending a debt beyond the generation for which it is contracted. I read from the letter of Mr. Jefferson to John W. Eppes, dated Monticello, June 24, 1813:

"It is a wise rule and should be fundamental in a Government disposed to cherish its credit, and at the same time to restrain the use of it within the limits of its faculties, 'never to borrow a dollar without laying a tax in the same instant for paying the interest annually, and the principal within a given term; and to consider that tax as pledged to the creditors on the public faith.' On such a pledge as this, sacredly observed, a Government may always command on a reasonable interest all the lendable money of their citizens, while the necessity of an equivalent tax is a salutary warning to them and their constituents against oppressions, bankruptcy, and its inevitable consequence, revolution. But the term of redemption must be moderate and at any rate within the limits of their rightful powers. But what limits, it will be asked, does this prescribe to their powers? What is to hinder them from creating a perpetual debt? The laws of nature, I answer. The earth belongs to the living, not to the dead. The will and the power of man expire with his life by nature's law. Some societies give it an artificial continuance for the encouragement of industry; some refuse it, as our aboriginal neighbors, whom we call barbarians. The generations of men may be considered as bodies or corporations. Each generation has the usufruct of the earth during the period of its continuance. When it ceases to exist the usufruct passes on to the succeeding generation, free and unincumbered, and so on, successively, from one generation to another, forever.

"We may consider each generation a distinct nation, with a right by the will of its majority to bind themselves, but none to bind the succeeding generation more than the inhabitants of another country. Or the case may be likened to the ordinary one of a tenant for life who may hypothecate the land for his debts during the continuance of his usufruct; but at his death the reversioner (who is also for life only) receives it exonerated for all burdens. The period of a generation, or the term of its life is determined by the laws of mortality which, varying a little only in different climates, offer a general average, to be found by observation. I turn, for instance, to Buffon's tables of twenty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety-four deaths, and the ages at which they happened, and I find that the numbers of all ages living at one moment half will be dead in twenty-four years and eight months. But (leaving out minors, who have not the power of self-government) of the adults (of twenty-one years of age) living at one moment, a majority of whom act for the society, one half will be dead in eighteen years and eight months. At nineteen years, then, from the date of a contract the majority of the contractors are dead and their contract with them. Let this general theory be applied to a particular case. Suppose the annual births of the State of New York to be twenty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety-four, the whole number of its inhabitants, according to Buffon, will be six hundred and seventeen thousand seven hundred and three, of all ages. Of these there would constantly be two hundred and sixty-nine thousand two hundred and eighty-six minors, and three hundred and forty-eight thousand four hundred and seventeen adults, of which last one hundred and seventy-four thousand two hundred and nine will be a majority. Suppose that majority on the first day of the year 1794 had borrowed a sum of money equal to the fee simple value of the State and to have consumed it in eating, drinking, and making merry in their day; or, if you please, in quarreling and fighting with their unoffending neighbors.

"Within eighteen years and eight months one half of the adult citizens were dead. Till then, being the majority, they might rightfully levy the interest of their debt annually on themselves and their fellow-revelers or fellow-champions. But at that period, say at this moment, a new majority have come into place, in their own right, and not under the rights, the conditions, or the laws of their predecessors. Are they bound to acknowledge the debt—to consider the preceding generation as having had a right to eat up the whole soil of their country in the course of a life, to alienate it from them, (for it would be an alienation to the creditors); and would they think themselves either legally or morally bound to give up their country and emigrate to another for subsistence? Every one will say no; that the soil is the gift of God to the living as much as it had been to the deceased generation; and that the laws of nature impose no obligation on them to pay this debt. And although, like some other natural rights, this has not yet entered into any declaration of rights, it is no less a law, and ought to be acted on by honest Governments. It is at this time a salutary curb on the spirit of war and indebtedness, which, since the modern theory of the perpetuation of debt, has drenched the earth with blood and crushed its inhabitants under burdens ever accumulating. Had this principle been declared in the British Bill of Rights England would have been placed under the happy disability of waging eternal war and of contracting her thousand millions of public debt. In seeking, then, for an ultimate term for the redemption of our debts, let us rally to this principle, and provide for their payment within the term of nineteen years at the farthest.

"Our Government has not as yet begun to act on the rule of loans and taxation going hand in hand. Had any loan taken place in my time I should have strongly urged a redeeming tax. For the loan which has been made since the last session of Congress, we should now set the example of appropriating some particular tax sufficient to pay the interest annually, and the principle within a fixed term, less than nineteen years. And I hope yourself and your committee will render the immortal service of introducing this practice. Not that it is expected that Congress should formally declare such a principle. They wisely enough avoid deciding on abstract questions. But they may be induced to keep themselves within its limits."

Again in a letter to the same gentleman dated Poplar Forest, September 11, 1813, he says:

"That we are bound to defray its expenses within our own time, and unauthorized to burden posterity with them, I suppose to have been proved in my former letter. I will place the question nevertheless in an additional point of view. The former regarded their independent right over the earth; this over their own persons. There have existed nations and civilized and learned nations who have thought that a father had a right to sell his child as a slave in perpetuity; that he could alienate his body and industry conjointly, and à fortiori his industry separately, and consume its fruits himself. A nation asserting this fratricidal right might well suppose they could burden with public as well as private debt their nati natorum et qui nascentur at illis.

"But we, in this age and in this country especially, are advanced beyond those notions of natural law. We acknowledge that our children are born free; that that freedom is the gift of nature, and not of him who begot them; that though under our care during infancy, and therefore of necessity under a duly tempered authority, that care is confided to us to be exercised for the preservation and good of the child only; and his labors during youth are given as a retribution for the charges of infancy. As he was never the property of his father, so when adult he is sui juris, entitled himself to the use of his own limbs and the fruits of his own exertions; so far we are advanced without mind enough, it seems, to take the whole step. We believe, or we act as if we believed, that although an individual father cannot alienate the labor of his son, the aggregate body of fathers may alienate the labor of all their sons, of their posterity in the aggregate, and oblige them to pay for all the enterprises, just or unjust, profitable or ruinous, into which our vices, our passions, or our personal interests may lead us. But I trust that this proposition needs only to be looked at by an American to be seen in its true point of view, and that we shall all consider ourselves unsaundered to saddle posterity with our debts, and morally bound to pay them ourselves; and consequently within what may be deemed the period of a generation, or the life of the majority. In my former letter I supposed this to be a little over twenty years. We must raise, then, ourselves the money for this war, either by taxes within the year or by loans; and if by loans, we must repay them ourselves, proscribing forever the English practice of perpetual funding, the ruinous consequences of which—putting right out of the question—should be a sufficient warning to a considerate nation to avoid the example."

I say, then, if any gentleman will propose a return to specie payments to-morrow he shall have my vote.

The gentleman talks about approaching specie payments gradually. Sir, when we approach specie payments we shall do so at once, whether it be sooner or whether it be later; and we may as well meet it now as to meet it next year, or to meet it ten years from this time. If we would adopt that bold financial policy which would make all our issues, all our Treasury notes, all our obligations, equal to coin, and put them upon a specie basis, in my opinion it would relieve us of all our financial troubles, embarrassments, and speculations, theoretically and practically. I know very well that in England, after specie payments had been suspended twenty years, a bold stroke of statesmanship proposed the resumption of specie payments, to the horror of all timid men. Yet experience showed that the apprehended danger was but a scarecrow that had been hanging before them for years, and the very moment they boldly met it and brushed it out of the way, all trouble vanished. A bold financial policy that will declare the convertibility of our currency issue into coin, in my opinion, will solve the financial problem, as well as the political problem that lies behind it.

But this bill, I apprehend, at least I fear, will not only give no relief, will not only not disembarass us, but will put our national debt beyond the future control of legislation; instead of making things better it will put them in such a situation that we cannot prevent their becoming worse. I am unwilling by our present legislation to fasten this debt upon the country for forty years.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. BROOMALL to the amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will, on condition that the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of saying that I was greatly surprised at the statement made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] in regard to the law. Now, I may be wrong in my understanding of the law; but if I am, and he is right, then there is, in my mind, this fatal objection to the section, that it allows an increase of the currency, and I should use my utmost exertions to have it stricken out.

I understood the gentleman to say that the Secretary of the Treasury has power under existing law to increase the volume of currency in this country by new issues to $450,000,000. Now, I admit that as the law originally stood, as passed June 30, 1864, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to issue $400,000,000 of currency; that was the limit. There was an additional provision, however, that for the purpose of redeeming a special class of securities, temporary loans, there might be temporarily issued $50,000,000 more. That was the law up to April 12, 1866. But on the 12th of April, 1866, a law was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to put a loan on the market, specifying what description of loan it should be. The law gave him very ample authority. Its object was expressed in these words:

"To authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to receive any Treasury notes, or other obligations issued under any act of Congress, whether bearing interest or not, in exchange for any description of bonds authorized by the act to which this is an amendment; and also to dispose of any description of bonds authorized by said act, either in the United States or elsewhere, to such an amount, in such manner, and at such rates as he may think advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value, which have been or which may be issued under any act of Congress, the proceeds thereof to be used only for retiring Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any increase of the public debt."

Now, notice the sweeping authority here conferred, that the Secretary may sell these bonds, and shall use the proceeds coming from their sale for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of retiring notes and other forms of indebtedness.

Mr. ALLISON. Not United States notes, but Treasury notes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; United States notes are specially named. This is the provision:

Provided, That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months after the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

Mr. PIKE. It says "for lawful money."

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly. This law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the loan and use the proceeds for this sole purpose; and lest he should retire and cancel the Treasury notes too rapidly under this authority conferred, he was restricted to $10,000,000 the first six months, and $4,000,000 monthly thereafter. Now, sir, every dollar that he retired and canceled under the provisions of this act and the restriction in the proviso was absolutely retired and blotted out, and was thereafter no more a part of our currency than as though it never had been authorized. Hence all the money that was in existence when this law was passed has been reduced by the extent of the retirement and cancellation which has since taken place. The balance is the lawful money authorized by the laws of the United States, and there is not a dollar more authorized, unless it be the $50,000,000 to which my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has referred for the specific and temporary purpose of canceling a temporary loan.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to oppose the amendment. We have provided in the first section of the bill for interest at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths. Now, what is the effect of this proposition? The country could not stand the effect of vesting in the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion to control the currency of the country to the amount of $4,000,000 per month; yet this proposition is to put in the hands of unknown men the power to operate upon the currency of the country to the amount of $100,000,000 whenever they please to do so. What is the condition of things to-day? There is in the East a very large surplus of capital seeking investment. It cannot find permanent investment; and, sir, it is for the interest of the country that it should not find permanent investment, because the season of the year is approaching when this money will be needed to move the crops from the South and the West to the East and to foreign markets. Now, if these people in the East who are holding this surplus capital, and who would within the next sixty days loan it for the purpose of moving the crops of the country to market, should be induced to invest it in these securities of the Government, those who are interested in moving the crops will be obliged to pay the persons owning this capital an advance upon the interest allowed by the Government sufficient to induce them to take the money out of the hands of the Government and invest it in the necessary business of the country. Sir, I say it is suicidal to put the Government in the attitude of a borrower of money on call to the injury of all the productive interests of the country. There is no defense for such a proposition.

Sir, I am more and more satisfied as I examine this bill that it is wrong in many essential particulars. Here are the 1881s, which are covered by the language of the first section of the bill. Does any one suppose that a man who has a bond payable, principal and interest, in coin in 1881, is going to surrender that bond for the purpose of taking such a bond as is provided for in this bill? Then we have the ten-forty five per cent., liable to Government taxation upon income, as is other property of the country. Is it any advantage worth considering for us to undertake the exchange of these securities for those proposed in this section, and would any one holding a ten-forty bond make the exchange?

Another serious, and to my mind fatal, objection to the whole policy of this bill is that the hands of the Government are to be tied for forty years, so that it cannot redeem these bonds without going into the markets of the world and purchasing them. Now, no matter at what rate you may fix the interest, whenever there is a surplus of money in the Treasury of the country the holders of these bonds will demand par for the principal of them, and very likely an advance.

In 1790 we issued three per cent. bonds, and in 1831-32 we were obliged for the sake of removing that indebtedness to pay one hundred cents on the dollar. Now, if the country continues to increase in population and in the development of its resources, in the next twenty or thirty years we will have forty-five or fifty million dollars a year to devote to the public debt. The proposition I had the honor to submit contemplates the removal of this debt. At the end of ten or twenty years we begin to have $50,000,000 a year which we can devote to the extinction of the public debt. If we have not the money at the time the credit of the country will be such that we can borrow on better terms than to-day. I am free, from my examination of the bill, to say that I condemn the entire policy of the bill as it came from the Committee of Ways and Means. As it comes from the Senate we can pay in twenty years. As it comes from the Committee of Ways and Means we cannot.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. Here is an amendment, and two speeches have been made in its favor and none against it. The last speech was not on the amendment at all, but was an attack on the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will withdraw the amendment if my colleague will renew it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague on the committee.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the law as it stands. In the act of March 3, 1863, it is provided, after having provided for an additional issue of United States notes which would make the amount $400,000,000, that for any of the said notes provided for in that bill or any other United States notes returned to the Treasury and canceled or destroyed there may be issued equal amounts of United States notes such as are authorized by this act. That law has never been repealed. It authorizes the reissue of any United States notes which have been canceled or destroyed, and at that time the amount was limited to $400,000,000. The act of June, 1864, provided that the total amount of United States notes issued or to be issued should never exceed $400,000,000, "and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loans." The temporary loan having all been redeemed the power to issue that $50,000,000 has ceased. Therefore the amount of United States Treasury notes authorized to be issued is limited to $400,000,000, and any that may be redeemed or canceled may be reissued under the act I first referred to, the act of March 3, 1863.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand my friend from Massachusetts to say that the temporary loan has been redeemed, and this $50,000,000 cannot be reissued. If he will look at the language he will see that it is not for the redemption of the temporary loan, but for the redemption of temporary loans. We may issue them, therefore, for a temporary loan. That has never been repealed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The law of March, 1866, authorized the issue of certificates.

Mr. ALLISON. The law says temporary loans should be redeemed by issuing United States notes.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. There has never been any act authorizing their cancellation but the one referred to. The act of April 12, 1866, merely limits the amount of contraction. This is the proviso in that act:

"Provided, That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month: And provided further, That the act to which this is an amendment shall continue in full force in all its provisions, except as modified by this act."

But there is no law that prevents the reissue of these notes which may have been so retired, not exceeding so much per annum. There is no law authorizing the redemption and cancellation of any United States notes. There is only a law limiting the amount that may be retired and canceled, and the authority under the original act that authorized the issue could reissue them again when the needs of the Government require it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Secretary of the Treasury might now go and on issue notes to the amount of all that have been hitherto retired, canceled, or burned during the last several years.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I think so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then what is the meaning of the law authorizing him to retire and cancel notes now outstanding, or the law that authorizes him to destroy them?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The law limits him so that he shall not retire beyond a certain amount.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there were no other words, is not that a very clear implication that he may retire and cancel just that number. But right above these words, in the body of the section, it is declared that the proceeds of all he shall sell shall be retired.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not propose to take part in this discussion, and would not had it not been for some observations that fell from my colleague, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] to which I wish to draw his attention and the attention of the House. He is usually so correct and just in his views that his remarks deserve careful attention. He objects to this whole bill. Why? Because, he says, under it we never shall be able to pay any part of our debt for forty years. He starts off with saying that nobody expects the bonds of 1881 to be funded under this bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I said the terms of the bill covered the entire interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States, but that nobody could expect that the 1881 ten-forty bonds would be exchanged for such bonds as are here proposed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have not mistaken my colleague's meaning. He says nobody expects the 1881 bonds or the ten-forty bonds will be exchanged under this bill. I agree to that. I do not think they will at present, if ever. The gentleman then further says we shall have all our indebtedness so locked up by this bill that we cannot pay it. But there are $283,000,000 of ten-forties coming due in less than ten years, which will be quite as much as we can pay by that time. Then there are $204,000,000 of five per cent. bonds which become due, and then there are the six per cent. bonds, which are due in 1881. All these together make enough for the next twenty years.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I agree to that; but if the gentleman will hear me, that is the force of necessity imposed upon us by the circumstances, not due to the policy of the bill, and we are accustomed to provide in such bills as this for a practical solution of difficulties.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is no difficulty at all. There are certain moneys due from us as fast as we can pay them. They will not come under this bill. There are certain other debts which we want to fund by this bill. There is one third or one fourth of our debt that will not come under this bill until we get ready to pay it. Then under the second section we provide for a sinking fund.

Mr. ALLISON. Do we pay these bonds in gold?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly; because the ten-forties and the 1881's are payable in gold; therefore they will be paid in gold. We have got enough to do with our gold for the next twenty years. Do not let anybody trouble himself about that matter. We have enough to do with all the gold we have got, or shall get; and then we have got all our currency to take care of besides. I want to get that funded if I can; and in order to do so I am willing to put it into bonds bearing three and sixty-five hundredths interest. My friend is afraid we shall not be able to get the money away from this investment to move the crops at the West. This is only three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest. Does he not know that now all banks take money on call at four per cent?

Mr. BOUTWELL. They can use it by taking it on call, but the Government cannot go into that sort of business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Government is not going into any such business at all. The Government has for many years been a borrower. There will be an exact business ratio established in this matter as there is in all others, so that there will always be a permanent amount thus deposited for the use of the Government. This is no new thing. Gentlemen think it is to be so. Why, there has been a like practice in Belgium, where they have the steadiest money market in the world and have had for a long series of years. The Government has a regular system of deposits like this upon bonds. Bank deposits do not run up to an immense amount one day and down the next, but have a steady average. When a man has currency that he does not want, he may, under the provisions of this bill, put it into the fund; when he wants currency and has these bonds, he goes and gives up the bonds and gets currency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I renew the proposition of the gentleman. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, if there is any advantage to be gained by this proposed legislation, it must be derived from the sections preceding the one now under consideration. The purpose entertained by the friends of this bill, as I understand it, is contained in the sections which precede this one. The great financial want of the country is to have settled now, once for all, so that the world will understand it, the purpose of the American people to pay its indebtedness according to the spirit as well as the letter of their subsisting contracts. The first section of this bill provides for funding the outstanding debt of this country upon terms therein named; that is, the principal and the interest at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. to be payable in coin and to be exempt from all taxation, Federal, State, and municipal. I do not pretend to say that if this bill were to pass in the form in which it now stands, the debt of the nation would be very rapidly funded. But I do say that a great object would be attained, namely, an act of solemn legislation proclaiming to the world the purpose of the American people to keep their integrity inviolate, to put it beyond the reach of question or challenge hereafter. We would go to the country upon it, and if the action of Congress should be sustained by the people at the polls in the coming election, as I believe it would, the credit of the country would be established beyond the power of designing men to shake or impair it.

As for the suggestion which has been made here, that you could not redeem this debt until the expiration of forty years, what is that to the American people compared to the great good to be attained, the establishment of their good faith before the nations of the earth? Before the end of forty years the increase of the population of this country, the great increase of the national wealth from the increased productive power and development of our national resources, would be such, if the integrity of the nation is maintained, if the pledged faith of the nation is preserved, that the $2,000,000,000 of the national debt contemplated to be funded by this bill would be as nothing to the people, who long before that period will number sixty millions.

One other remark. The extension of this credit for forty years, with a reduction of two and one third per cent. semi-annually in the interest upon the whole debt, would enable us to save, in the time named, an amount equal to the entire principal of the debt.

Now, as to the section under consideration, I desire to say that it does not stand with the general purpose and policy of the bill. That section proposes the funding of the non-interest-bearing debt, thereby converting it into an interest-bearing debt. I am opposed to that, and trust that the section will be rejected. There is no occasion for it; there is no occasion for new legislation to provide for the redemption of our outstanding legal-tender notes, nor for withdrawing them at present from circulation. I ventured to say on this floor in 1862, when the legal-tender bill was pending, and no man challenged the statement, it was assented to by every member present, that the legal effect of the legal-tender act was that the Government of the United States should ultimately redeem every dollar of the legal-tender notes in coin; that it was the obligation of the sovereignty, unless it was otherwise nominated in the bond, that when the Government issued its legal-tender notes, promising the payment of a specific sum in dollars, nothing else appearing in the obligation or the statute, it implied that when the Government had the means to resume specie payment it would redeem its legal-tender notes to the uttermost farthing in coin. That is the law to-day; it needs no further legislation to impose this obligation upon the Government. No further legislation can add to the obligation of the United States so to redeem its promise to pay in dollars every legal-tender note. I have never heard from any quarter of this country, either in the platform of any party or in the speech of any partisan, any intimation that the Government of the United States, under existing law, is not under obligation, whenever its means will enable it so to do, to redeem its outstanding legal-tender notes in coin. That being so, there is no necessity for further legislation to assure the world of our purpose to fulfill our obligation in that respect.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman from Ohio in reference to the effect of this section of the bill. I believe there is a portion of our debt which by law is not payable otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, whether that be at the time of payment gold or silver or greenbacks. That I understood to be the language of the statute under which the debt was created. That being the case, I deem it essentially necessary that a provision of this kind should be inserted in this bill. The question is not whether our credit is bad or good; but if the money of the United States known as legal tender is lawful money of the United States, it is nothing but proper and just that this money should be, according to the provisions of this section, convertible into bonds, and these bonds convertible again into money. Such a provision will not have a tendency to depreciate our credit or to affect the value of the lawful money of the United States; it will have the diametrically opposite effect. It will tend to advance the value of our lawful money. When a man understands that his bonds are convertible into money, or his money into bonds at the Treasury of the Government, to the extent of $100,000,000, as provided in this section, the effect will be to depreciate the price of gold and to advance the value of our legal-tender currency.

Now, sir, I have many times on this floor heard it maintained (and I have sometimes felt chagrined by such remarks) that those persons who entertained the views which I now express are nothing more than repudiators of the public debt. Sir, I am tired of hearing this kind of talk. A proposition of this kind contains none of the elements of repudiation. The effect of such a law would not be detrimental either to the bondholder or to the people of the country. But it is said our credit should be maintained. Certainly it should. I am in favor of maintaining the credit of the United States. I am in favor of maintaining it, as the gentleman from Ohio says, by letting the world know that we are honest, and not only that we are honest but that we are determined to pay our whole indebtedness in good faith though it takes the utmost farthing. The question is as to the means by which we are to do this. In my view the best policy is the reduction of the interest upon our now outstanding debt. In order to accomplish this we must, as I have already remarked, appreciate our currency; we must adopt some measure under which gold will not be kept up constantly at 140, while our greenbacks continue depreciated as they are at the present time. I believe that the effect of this section would be to enhance the value of our currency and to depreciate gold.

I am aware, sir, that much interest is felt in regard to another part of this bill; and while up I may as well say a word or two on that point. I refer to the provision that all contracts made after the passage of this bill for the payment of obligations in gold may be enforced by the courts. That provision has been stricken out by the Committee of Ways and Means. Why? Its effect would be to give to the moneyed man the power of saying to the man indebted to him, "I will change the debt, but you shall pay me gold." It would compel the poor men of this country to act as pioneers in the resumption of specie payments. I am opposed to any proposition of that kind. I am in favor of reducing, if possible, the interest on our bonds. I am in favor of a system which would go even further than this bill proposes. I would go beyond the amount of $300,000,000, and would authorize to the extent of $450,000,000 this exchange of bonds into greenbacks and greenbacks into bonds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew it. I move to strike out $400,000,000 and insert $356,000,000, very little less than the present outstanding United States notes, upon the assumption that there is no authority for issuing $400,000,000. I do not, by moving the amendment, concede any such thing. I deny the proposition. And, sir, I will not talk about other sections of this bill, or what other nations have done, but about this particular section now before us. Mr. Chairman, what is the history of this issue of United States notes? We find by the act of March 3, 1863, it was provided—

"There may be issued on the credit of the United States the sum of $50,000,000 of United States notes, including the amount of such notes heretofore authorized by the joint resolution approved January 17, 1863, in such form as he may deem expedient, not bearing interest, payable to bearer, and of such denominations, not less than one dollar, as he may prescribe, which notes so issued shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt; and any of the said notes when returned to the Treasury may be reissued from time to time as the exigencies of the public service may require. And in lieu of any of said notes, or any other United States notes returned to the Treasury and canceled or destroyed, there may be issued equal amounts of United States notes such as are authorized by this act."

By the act of June 30, 1864, there was an increase authorized with this restriction, that the total amount of United States notes issued, or to be issued, shall never exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum not exceeding $50,000,000 as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loans. So far as that is concerned the question arises whether temporary loans meant temporary loans in the future, or the temporary loan authorized by that act. If it means that temporary loan, then it has done its office; but I make no question about that $50,000,000. What does my colleague say as to the authority to issue $400,000,000? That it is inferred, that it is established by fair implication when the Secretary of the Treasury was prohibited from reducing at the rate of more than $10,000,000 the first six months after April, 1866, or more than $4,000,000 in any one month thereafter, and when the provision was made that on the sale of securities the money should only be used for retiring notes, they never could be reissued. I deny any such implication. I deny any such conclusion from the fair construction of the law. I deny the Committee on Finance in the Senate, the Committee of Ways and Means in the House, and all others have been so long mistaken about the authority to issue $400,000,000 which led to this provision in the Senate bill and its retention here.

What is the law? We are told that the Secretary of the Treasury cannot go up to $400,000,000, but he can go down, with the provision he shall never contract except at such a rate. The gentleman admits it is only by implication. He assumes there is no such provision in the law which will allow the Secretary of the Treasury to go up to $400,000,000, and he rules this inference because it is provided the Secretary of the Treasury shall not go downward except at a certain rate, although he may go down to $1,000,000, yet he could never go up to $400,000,000. But we are not left to inference, for it is provided in the act to which I have first referred for $150,000,000 what these rates shall be and for what they shall be receivable:

"And any of the said notes, when returned to the Treasury, may be reissued from time to time as the exigencies of the public service may require. And in lieu of any of said notes, or any other United States notes, returned to the Treasury, or canceled or destroyed, there may be issued equal amounts of United States notes, such as are authorized by this act."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, rose—
Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will oppose my amendment, as I have made a very bad one.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I rise merely to call the attention of the House to the $50,000,000 additional issue authorized by the act of June 30, 1864, which is in these words:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the receipt, as a temporary loan of United States notes or the notes of national banking associations, on deposit for not less than thirty days, in sums not less than fifty dollars, by any Assistant Treasurer of the United States," "who shall issue certificates of deposit in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, bearing interest not exceeding six per cent."

It then goes on to provide that for the payment of such deposit of United States notes not exceeding $50,000,000, including the amount already applied for any such payment, the United States notes held in reserve shall be used only when wanted, in his judgment, for the payment of said deposit on demand. I think my friend from Iowa does not claim that this provision is applicable to the $50,000,000 of certificates authorized to be issued three years afterward for the redemption of the compound-interest notes.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question? He concludes that the law authorized the issue of $400,000,000 of greenbacks, as I understand.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELKER. I see by the provisions of this section that it authorizes the decrease of the greenback circulation $100,000,000 and the substitution of interest-bearing notes in place of them, and also authorized an increase of greenbacks and a decrease of the bonded debt to the same amount.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say in answer to what my colleague has said that if the law is as he alleges, it presents this peculiar, and, as it seems to me, absurd result: that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by law to retire, cancel, and destroy from forty to one hundred million dollars of United States notes, and the next week or the next day may print and issue just the same amount again, and all this by authority of law. If anybody can see any reason in such a law he is more astute than I am. I know there is a provision of the law that he may destroy mutilated notes and issue new ones.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask whether something must not be left to the discretion and sense of decent propriety of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BROOMALL. Not much; as little as possible.

Mr. SCHENCK. But in this particular matter the law of 1863 provided that in lieu of said notes or any other United States notes returned to the Treasury and canceled or destroyed, there might be issued equal amounts, without any of the restrictions the gentleman speaks of. It is only left to his good sense not to take them one day and put them out again the next.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the best reason for my position. That law appears to me to refer to the notes that had theretofore been destroyed. Under that law the Secretary was authorized to reissue notes to the amount that had been authorized by law, but which by another law had been canceled and destroyed. But it seems to me it would be a very violent construction of the law to hold that the law of 1863 had a prospective application and applies for all time to come to all notes that may be authorized by any law to be redeemed and destroyed. Now, all I have to say in conclusion, is that if my colleague's construction is correct, it proves to me the absolute necessity of amending this section so as to prevent an increase of the present volume of the currency. Rather than authorize an increase I would lose the section altogether.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. BROOMALL, there were—ayes 35, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not insist upon tellers.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by adding to the section the following, which I hope will be adopted:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize an increase of United States notes above the amount now outstanding.

The question being put on the amendment, there were—ayes 51, noes 57.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. GARFIELD and BUTLER of Massachusetts.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LYNCH. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to issue United States coupon bonds to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000, of such denominations, not less than $100, or the multiple of $100, as the Secretary shall prescribe, payable in lawful money, on demand, bearing interest at the rate of three per cent. per annum, payable quarterly yearly in lawful money, and subject to State, municipal, and local taxation; said bonds to be issued to any person paying therefor the par value thereof in lawful money at the Treasury of the United States, and shall be redeemed by the United States at any time twenty years after their first issue and not earlier, except at the option of the holder, as hereinafter provided, and at the expiration of said twenty years shall be paid in coin.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall take up said bonds whenever presented for that purpose at the Treasury of the United States, paying therefor, in lawful money, the par value thereof and the accrued interest thereon, to the amount of any matured and unpaid coupon thereto attached; and the bonds so taken up may be reissued in manner provided for their first issue, the interest which may have accrued on any coupon thereto attached, at the time of said reissue, being paid by the purchaser in addition to the par value of the bonds; and said bonds may continue to be reissued as before at any time or times during the period of ten years, after which they shall not be again reissued.

Mr. LYNCH. The first section of this bill provides for funding the entire debt of the United States in bonds running for forty years, to be coupon or registered bonds, bearing the rate of interest of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent., payable in coin, to be exempt from all taxation; and this third section provides that United States notes, circulating notes may be changed into these bonds at par and reexchanged for notes at the option of the holder. The effect of this is that the United States would pay for money on call five and eleven hundredths per cent. on currency, while the banks of the country pay nothing whatever. With $200,000,000 on deposit in the banks of New York to-day, I ask gentlemen if they suppose that under this provision $100,000,000 of that money would not immediately go into the United States Treasury, where their money would be kept for them and they would be paid five and eleven hundredths per cent. and it would be exempt from taxation? I want to call the attention of the committee to the effect of the exemption from taxation under this section. Whenever the time for the assessment of local taxation came round, every man would put his money into these United States bonds for a week and draw the interest on it and be released from all taxation, getting it back again as soon as he required it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How can you tax greenbacks in a man's pocket now?

Mr. LYNCH. By the law which was passed to tax them in the last Congress. They were exempt from taxation under the first law as all other United States notes and bonds were exempt, but in the last Congress or in the present Congress, we have passed a law subjecting them to taxation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What law is that?

Mr. LYNCH. The bill passed through this House. Whether it has become a law or not I do not know.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no such law as that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentlemen refer to the act?

Mr. LYNCH. I cannot refer to it. But such a bill was reported and passed the House. I do not know whether it became a law or not.

Mr. PIKE. It ought to have.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no such law in existence.

Mr. LYNCH. There are not more than two States, one of which is Ohio, where money is not taxed and where the tax is not collected. I understand that the bill to which I refer has not passed. It ought to have passed, if it has not.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. It is on our Calendar now.

Mr. LYNCH. I supposed it had passed. I supposed the House had sense enough to pass such a bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Maine has repeated the argument against the section reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, but has told us nothing about the features of his own substitute. I rise for the purpose of putting my opposition to his amendment into practical shape. I propose that by unanimous consent all debate on this section be now closed.

Mr. PIKE. I hope that will be done. Debate is very damaging to the section. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBURN. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. BOWWELL having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union on the pending section of the funding bill be closed in half a minute after the Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will give half a minute longer I will not object.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 77, noes 28.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, the pending question being on the substitute offered by Mr. LYNCH for the amendment as an additional section reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Before that question is put, I move to amend the section by inserting after the word "Treasurer," in line eleven, the words "or any Assistant Treasurer;" and by striking out in line thirteen the words "the Treasurer" and inserting "such officer;" so that it will read:

And any holder of any of the bonds provided for in the first section of this act may present the same to the Treasurer of the United States or any Assistant Treasurer and demand lawful money of the United States for the principal and accrued interest thereon, and such officer shall redeem the same in lawful money of the United States, &c.

The question was put; and the amendment was disagreed to—ayes twenty-nine, noes not counted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out the proviso as follows:

Provided, That such conversion shall not be allowed at any time when the amount of United States notes outstanding is reduced to $300,000,000.

And also the following words:

Unless the United States notes then outstanding shall amount to $400,000,000; and such bond shall not be so redeemable after the United States have resumed the payment of coin for their notes.

The section will then read:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the holder of any lawful money of the United States to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple of fifty dollars, may convert the same into bonds for an equal amount, authorized by the first section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. And any holder of any of the bonds provided for in the first section of this act may present the same to the Treasurer of the United States and demand lawful money of the United States for the principal and accrued interest thereon, and the Treasurer shall redeem the same in lawful money of the United States.

The question was put; and the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. LYNCH's substitute.

Mr. LYNCH. I withdraw the substitute. It has not been printed, and is evidently not understood.

Mr. COBURN. I move to strike out the following:

The holder of any lawful money of the United States to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple of fifty dollars, may convert the same into bonds for an equal amount, authorized by the first section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That such conversion shall not be allowed at any time when the amount of United States notes outstanding is reduced to $300,000,000. And.

So that the section will read:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That any holder of any of the bonds provided for in the first section of this act may present the same to the Treasurer of the United States and demand lawful money of the United States for the principal and accrued interest thereon, and the Treasurer shall redeem the same in lawful money of the United States, unless the United States notes then outstanding shall amount to $400,000,000; and such bond shall not be so redeemable after the United States have resumed the payment of coin for their notes.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to insert after the words "three hundred" the words "and fifty-five;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That such conversion shall not be allowed at any time when the amount of United States notes outstanding is reduced to $355,000,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to insert after the word "into" the words "any coupon;" so that it will read:

That the holder of any lawful money of the United States to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple of fifty dollars, may convert the same into any coupon bonds for an equal amount, &c.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out "four," in line fifteen, and insert "five;" so that it will read:

Unless the United States notes then outstanding shall amount to $500,000,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I move to strike out "four" and insert "eight."

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes nineteen, noes not counted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to strike out the word "not" before "shall," on the sixteenth line; so that it will read: "and such bond shall be so redeemable after the United States have resumed the payment of coin for their notes."

The question was put; and the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means as an additional section; and being put there were—ayes 35, noes 61.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms, anything in the several acts relating to United States notes to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That this section shall not apply to contracts for the borrowing of currency or the removal or extension of an indebtedness under a contract already entered into, unless such contract originally required payment in coin.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of Ways and Means report in favor of striking out this section.

Mr. AXTELL. I hope the section will not be stricken out. The lawyers in the House, of course, understand that these contracts for gold payments are legal contracts; the difficulty is in enforcing them. In California we have empowered the common-law courts to enforce these contracts, when made in writing, the same that courts of equity enforce specific contracts. If a man agrees to deliver so much gold, he is to be held bound to deliver it. If a man agrees to pay for a certain article in gold, thereby avoiding the fluctuations of Government paper, the courts of California are authorized to enforce that contract.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. AXTELL. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of my friend, the gentleman from California, [Mr. AXTELL,] if I promise to pay him any given sum in money, is not that, in his judgment, a constitutional and legal obligation on my part to pay him in gold or silver coin if he demands it? I understand that to have been the doctrine of this Government ever since its organization, that when I agree to pay a dollar I agree to pay that dollar in the gold or silver coin of the country, and that all this humbug talk of the right to pay in horses, sheep, or cattle, or in rags, in the absence of any agreement or understanding at the time the contract is made, is foreign to the Constitution and laws of the country. The only right which we have to pay the five-twenties in greenbacks is because those bonds were issued with that understanding and agreement; that is a part of the contract under which the bonds were created.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to know what the gentleman refers to when he talks about paying in rags. Does he call greenbacks rags? That is not the doctrine of the New York platform.

Mr. AXTELL. The question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] is somewhat too long for me to answer at this time. I do not suppose this Congress could empower the State courts in any way to enforce contracts specifically; but it could empower the United States courts to do so. By that means we would come back to the proper standard of money, to wit: gold. The expression "gold is rising" or "gold is falling" is incorrect, and misleads the public mind. Gold is the unit of the proper monetary standard, and it is the securities of the Government that rise and fall in the market, and not gold.

Allowing contracts for payment in gold to be made and enforced, we will be taking one step toward specie payment. We do not by this means avoid the legal-tender act, which I would not do, for I believe it was a matter of great necessity to the country at the time it was made. But we have now certainly reached a time when we can assert in this act that gold and silver is money, and that alone is money. The power of the Government enables men to pay debts in a particular kind of paper; not in "rags," but in legal-tender notes. It was necessary, in the exigencies of the country, that they should be allowed to do so. By now retaining this section and saying that when a man makes a contract to pay in gold the courts shall be authorized to enforce that contract, we will be taking one step in the right direction toward the resumption of specie payment. The contract should be made in writing. I cannot say, after a number of years' experience in the courts, and in the mining countries, that it falls more upon the poor debtor than upon any other debtor. This section does not apply to past contracts, but it relates to contracts to be made from this time forward, and will help the poor man. The poor man will contract to pay so much money for what he buys, and to receive so much money for his labor, to pay and receive it in gold, without being subject to the fluctuations of the greenback market. Gold does not fall; it remains the same all the time like the mountains from which it is obtained. It is the paper money of the country that rises and falls, that ebbs and flows like the tide, though not with the same regularity.

I hope this section will be retained in the bill. I assure the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that the practical working of it will not be to injure the poor debtor, but it will prove a benefit to him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have several objections to this proposition of the Senate, proposing to legalize contracts which may hereafter be made for the payment of obligations in gold. We have now on our statute-book a law which makes United States notes, as they are termed, a legal tender; and the effect of the proposition now before us would be to authorize by law two kinds of circulation in this country, to legalize two kinds of money for the people. I am opposed to any such policy.

Again, sir, this proposition would put the poor man in the power of the money lender. It would give to the man to whom money is owing, or the man holding a mortgage upon a house or a farm, the right to say when the debt or mortgage became due, "I must have my money, or, if you cannot pay it, I will extend the time provided you make a new contract and pay me in gold." It would thus place the poor man in the power of the man of means, allowing the former to be coerced into the payment of gold when the gold might not be in the country. It would compel such men to become the gold purchasers in this country, instead of the money lenders transacting that business. Again, sir, by the adoption of this section legalizing contracts for payment in gold and subjecting the poor man to the mercy of the money lender, we should increase the price of gold.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Illinois will allow me to remind him that gold has gone up two and a half per cent. since the Senate adopted this provision.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; and it would go up ten per cent. if the House should adopt it and the President sign the bill. Now, sir, the gentleman from California [Mr. AXTELL] is a lawyer, and I would like to put to him or any other lawyer a question. We have now upon our statute-book a law called the legal-tender act. Suppose that under the provision now proposed, a man should make a gold contract upon which suit should be brought. The judgment, I suppose, would be payable in gold. Now, I would like to know in what currency the officer who executed the judgment would get his pay, whether in gold or in legal-tender currency?

Mr. AXTELL. He would be empowered by this act to enforce the payment of the judgment in gold.

Mr. LOGAN. The law makes United States currency a legal tender, and the officer would have no contract for the payment of his fees and costs in gold. Hence the judgment would be collected in gold, and the costs in greenbacks. You might as well pass a law providing that if a man should make a contract for fifty cords of wood the judgment should be for fifty cords of wood, but that the costs should be paid in greenbacks. That is the principle precisely. I suppose the gentleman from California would go upon the principle adopted by an old justice of the peace in my county in old times when we had a sort of law called "chimney-corner law." A man had given his note for a cow and a calf worth ten dollars. An action was brought on the note when it became due, and it was proved that there were two calves at that time. So the justice of the peace gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the cow and one calf, and then gave judgment in favor of the constable for the other calf, saying he should take that for his costs. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, while we have a legal-tender act on our statute-book, I am in favor of maintaining that law. If we desire to legalize gold contracts, let us repeal our legal tender act. This section is only an indirect way of repealing what, if repealed at all, should be repealed directly. Hence I am opposed to the provision. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to strike out the word "specifically" in the second line. Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist, according to the Constitution and laws of this country, when a man agrees to pay a debt, or any sum of money, he agrees to pay it in money, and the only money known to the law of this country, until Congress attempted to make "greenbacks" money, was the gold and silver coin of the country.

A MEMBER. Why, then, do you insist the debt of this country shall be paid in "greenbacks"?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The reason why we insist the debt of this country should be paid in "greenbacks," is because it was contracted with the understanding, with the knowledge of the creditors of the Government, that the Government had made "greenbacks" a legal tender for such debts as we propose so to pay. The debt was contracted; the bonds issued to be paid, expressly to be paid, in greenbacks, and this is specified on the back of the greenbacks themselves. I ask the Clerk to read the condition upon which the "greenbacks" were issued. I happen yet to have a ten dollar greenback in my possession, and I ask the Clerk to read what is upon the back of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"This note is a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and is receivable in payment of all loans made to the United States."

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I object to that bill being returned to the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. Let it go upon the record.

Mr. MULLINS. I make the point of order that as the bill has been offered it must go upon the Journal. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope not, as it would then be a constant temptation to these gentlemen to mutilate the Journal. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MULLINS. Not in the way he has attempted to do it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I say to the House, in the absence of any express provision, a contract to pay money is a contract to pay in gold and silver coin; and the reason why our debt is payable in greenbacks is that it was taken with a knowledge of the law (which was the contract) upon the statute-book making the description of notes, from which the Clerk has read, a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except as therein stated. It is not only according to the spirit, but according to the letter of the law; and if gentlemen on the other side intend to carry out their Chicago platform, it will be according to the spirit and letter of that platform as well as according to the letter and spirit of the law to pay in greenbacks. I insist, sir, there is no necessity to pass a law that when I agree to pay money I must make the agreement specific to pay in gold and silver coin in order to oblige me to do it. In the absence of any law or agreement there is no doubt it is to be paid in gold and silver. Can there be any doubt that without this law an agreement to pay in gold a specified number of dollars would be a legal and valid agreement?

Gold coin is certainly either money or merchandise. If coin, as I have contended, then there can be no question that gold or silver could be required, whether specified or not. If gold is only merchandise, then it must, like other merchandise, be the subject of sale and purchase, and any contract for the sale or purchase must be valid whether we adopt this section or not. It will be seen, therefore, that in any view this section is useless.

Mr. AXTELL. I will ask the gentleman a question which is a question. Is a tax a debt?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suppose a tax is a debt after it has been levied and the party upon whom it is levied has become liable to pay it. But what does the gentleman infer from that?

Mr. AXTELL. We pay our taxes in coin and insist it is a debt.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why pay in coin when a "greenback" is made a legal tender? The Government may, I suppose, take what it pleases in payment of itself. It may certainly take its own promise to pay in payment of a debt due it. But I insist, in the absence of any contract, I insist the law of this country is that you are to pay in gold and silver coin. The gentleman refers, I suppose, to the practice in his own State.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it was remarked a few moments ago that gold had risen two per cent.

A MEMBER. A half per cent.

Mr. HIGBY. I think he said two per cent. I am of the opinion if we continue this debate it will rise twenty per cent. The disposition in this House seems to be to drive gold and silver coin out of our midst and substitute "greenbacks" in its stead. That seems to be the great struggle. Instead of allowing the Government to return to its original and normal condition of having gold and silver as the basis of currency the disposition seems to be to bury them so it will be difficult ever to find them again. I will say to the House that if this line of argument is to be pursued here we may give up all hopes of sustaining the credit and good faith of this Government before the world. We have got to go upon a credit system. We are a debtor as a nation to the amount of over three thousand million dollars and we have not $200,000,000 of coin in the Treasury. We are not gathering over that amount yearly, and while we are attempting to borrow gold and silver we propose to pass a law that shall lessen the rate of interest and expect bonds to be taken. God forgive us for our folly if we expect to accomplish any such purpose as that. Pass a law to-day that the Secretary of the Treasury when he has over a certain amount of gold and silver in the Treasury shall begin to redeem these Treasury notes—not authorize him but direct him to do it—then you will get back toward specie payment and you will find the greenbacks rising nearer to par in gold. That is the course we should pursue. Then we shall begin to see gold instead of burying it out of sight. Then we shall begin to establish the credit of our nation instead of destroying it, as we are doing by the arguments that are made here to day.

I hope that this section will be retained. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] tells us we are going to have two kinds of currency. Well, in God's name if we cannot have but one let us have gold. Let that come to the surface as fast as it can. If two men want to stipulate that they will receive or pay gold, let their contract be executed. I apprehend no danger whatever from that. I think, on the contrary, it will be a most wholesome provision.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOYDEN. I move to strike out the words in the third line "according to its terms" and to insert the words "in gold." I am in favor of retaining this section authorizing parties to contract to pay in gold. This talk about its putting the poor man in the power of the wealthy man I look upon as all humbug. Sir, I suppose the opposition to this section goes upon the ground that we are more capable of making contracts for men than they are for themselves. I had supposed that we had liberty in this country to make such contracts as we pleased; to pay in gold and silver, in horses, or anything else. But it seems that we are here to assume the right to make contracts for the people of the country and deny to them the right to make them in their own way. Sir, let a man make a trade to pay in gold. It is not any more likely to prove inimical to the poor man than to the wealthy man. It is a very absurd and ridiculous proposition that we should attempt to forbid a man to make such a trade as he pleases, and especially that he shall not make a trade to pay in gold, or if he does he shall not be permitted to enforce it. I agree with the gentleman who spoke just now, that every promise to pay in money properly considered under our laws is a promise to pay in gold; but inasmuch as we have a law authorizing the payment in greenbacks there is no difficulty. One gentleman asks, "What sort of a judgment will you get? You will have the principal of your debt paid in gold and the interest paid in currency." Well, pray, what harm does that do? It does not injure anybody.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question if he has no objection?

Mr. BOYDEN. None at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there any law now against a man's paying a debt in gold if he desires to do so?

Mr. BOYDEN. That is not the point. The point is, you have a law that says every debt shall be paid in greenbacks, and when we pass this bill we repeal it so far as this section goes.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not this law indirectly repeal that law?

Mr. BOYDEN. As far as a contract is agreed to be paid in gold it does and is intended to do that. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. ALLISON. I oppose the amendment for the reason that I am opposed to any indirect way of reaching specie payment, and I am opposed to the Government enforcing contracts between individuals that it is not prepared to enforce on the part of itself. It is proposed here to allow parties to make contracts specifically payable in gold, and yet we require every man who makes a contract with the Government of the United States to take a United States note which is lawful money. We therefore place ourselves in the position of allowing parties in court to enforce a contract against an individual which cannot be enforced against the Government.

Now, I am opposed to this indirect method of reaching specie payment. If the legal tender provision of our law passed in 1862 is no longer necessary, let us be manly and repeal that provision; but let us not by this indirect legislation give the creditor class an advantage of the debtor class in this country. If we propose to do it let it be done in a direct way by repealing the legal-tender clause which makes a United States note legal tender in payment of any debt. It is not a ridiculous proposition to say that we shall have by means of this third section, if it is retained in the bill, two classes of money in this country. It will not be long before we have but one class of money, because, if this section is retained in the bill, instead of having legal tender currency as lawful money, you will find that all exchanges in the city of New York will be conducted in gold, and your "greenbacks," instead of being lawful money, will be sold and quoted at fifty, sixty, or seventy cents on the dollar, as the case may be.

I should be perfectly willing to enforce specific contracts, to require the courts where a man paid gold or loaned gold, to enforce the repayment in gold; but to enable the creditor class to control the debtor class in this country by making contracts now payable in lawful money specifically payable in gold, in my judgment, is an indirect way to reach at once a proposition which the country is not prepared for, to wit: the resumption of specie payment, and for that reason I am opposed to any amendment which would retain this section in the bill.

Mr. BOYDEN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I move to amend the section by inserting after the word "coin," in the two places where it occurs, the words "or gold dust according to its value." I offer that amendment for the simple reason that in the country in which I live in all contracts the amounts are given in ounces, pennyweights, and grains. That is the way that we make contracts in the mountains. That is the way that contracts are made in all mining countries. I desire as an act of justice to the miners that this amendment shall be adopted, because that is the only coin we know there. The amendment is just and proper, and ought to prevail.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think the adoption of this section would be most disastrous to the country. The direct result would be that all contracts would have to be made for gold. Every unscrupulous man, where a debt is due and is desired to be continued by the debtor, would compel his debtor to give a contract in gold, or refuse to renew it. Every one who owed a debt and made a contract of this kind, instead of paying greenbacks as he does now, would have to go to New York or send to the gold centers and purchase gold. There would be a demand not only for the amount of gold necessary for interest, and for the payment of duties, and for imports, but for the payment of every debt throughout the land. It would result in commercial revulsion and disaster widespread throughout the land. It would result in the enhancement of the value of gold, I will venture to say, fifty per cent. in thirty days. There would be such a scene of disaster and ruin in this country as we never have witnessed.

We had in our own State a parallel instance of this kind. During the hard times of 1837, when everybody in debt was going to the wall, there was a clause in our statutes by which debtors were relieved through appraisement and valuation laws. This was virtually a stop to the payment and collection of debts. But a year or two after those laws came in force a law was passed providing that contracts could be made without the relief of the valuation and appraisement laws. What was the result? In less than a year almost every contract and note in the State was made with the limitation, "without the relief of the valuation and appraisement laws." And although those laws are not yet directly repealed, they are practically repealed, for all the printed forms of notes, contracts, bonds, and mortgages, contain the clause, "without the relief of the valuation and appraisement laws."

And the result would be similar in this case, that all notes would be printed "payable in coin," and there would consequently be an immense rise in the value of gold. We have not more than $200,000,000 of gold coin in this country. I know that there are estimates from the special Commissioner of the Revenue and from the Secretary of the Treasury that there are over $300,000,000 in gold coin in this country. But that estimate is not founded upon any satisfactory basis; it is mere guess work. I do not believe the gold coin of the country exceeds the sum of $200,000,000, and that is needed for the purpose of paying the duties on imports, the interest on the public debt, and for foreign goods, and none will be left for the use of the million of debtors. Adopt this system and there will be general derangement of business and widespread bankruptcy and ruin.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I move to amend this section by adding to it the following:

Provided further, That any contract made payable in coin may be paid in United States notes, by adding to the amount of the contract the amount of premium at which coin may sell in the New York market on the day the contract matures.

Mr. LOGAN. That develops exactly the state of things which this system will bring about.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I am not especially anxious that this section shall be retained in the bill; but if it is retained I think the proviso I have moved should be attached to it. I am in favor of reaching specie payment at some time; but I am afraid that under the bill as it now stands we should reach it too suddenly.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I rise to a point of order. What has become of the amendment I have offered?

The CHAIRMAN. It is pending, and will be voted on when the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUBBARD] shall have been disposed of.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. The effect of my amendment would be to make coin the standard of value. At the same time it recognizes United States notes as money by the payment of which the terms of the contract may be fulfilled, and the party required to pay coin would have the option of paying in coin or currency. But as I have stated coin would be the standard value, while the variation of value would be in United States notes. Now the standard of value is United States notes, and the variation is in the value of gold. It would be a step in the direction of specie payments, but would shorten the step so as to permit payments to be made in coin or currency at the option of the party making the payment.

Mr. LOGAN. I would inquire of the gentleman if the effect of his amendment would not be to make the legal rate of interest at least forty per cent.; that is, would not a man get $140 for a note of $100?

Mr. CAKE. On its first renewal?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I do not so understand it. If the effect of this measure be as some suppose, to render United States notes less valuable compared with coin, in my judgment it would not make any difference; present contracts which are payable in United States notes could be paid at a less cost to the debtor. It is true the debtor might be compelled to pay his debt, but he would have the option of borrowing money elsewhere on perhaps more favorable terms.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. The present condition of the business of the country is such that dealers in all foreign commodities, teas, coffees, spices, &c., are obliged to contract to pay in coin. All those commodities are to-day in all our commercial sea-ports bought and sold in coin, and in no other way. The man who purchases these articles of the importer must make an arrangement to pay for them in coin, either at sight, or in thirty, sixty, or ninety days, as the case may be. My amendment merely proposes to legalize transactions which are now sustained by commercial honor and commercial integrity. I therefore trust that if this section of the bill is retained my amendment may be adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise for the purpose of moving that the committee rise, to terminate debate on this section.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to say a few words.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] four minutes of my time, reserving to myself one minute in which to make the proposition to stop debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this section will be struck out as recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means. The views expressed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] ought to impel him and every gentleman on that side who agrees with him to vote to strike out the section, which, if he be right in his assumption, is but a lame and impotent attempt to reenact in this bill a provision of the Constitution of the United States. If under the Constitution, as he claims, every monetary contract in this country is dischargeable alone in gold and silver, any law of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding, then the legislation here proposed is a work of supererogation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman must excuse me; I have but four minutes. I have stated the gentleman's position, and have said all I desire to say on that subject.

One word further as to the effect which this section must have if enacted into a law. There are now owing by the people of the United States debts to the amount of hundreds of millions, I venture to say thousands of millions of dollars. This section is simply an enactment to crush the debtor part of the community; an enactment in the interest of the money-monger; an enactment in the interest of the usurer; and for that reason I am opposed to it.

Again, sir, it is an enactment against the interests of the Republic. I have no objection to gentlemen ringing the changes upon the old cry which they raised when the nation was struggling for its existence, that nothing can be a legal tender in this country but gold and silver. Sir, every well-informed man knows that nothing was ever a legal tender of universal application in the United States save in so far as it was made such by an act of Congress. Your Constitution is silent on the subject, save in the limitation which it imposes on the several States, not upon Congress.

Again, sir, all the debts of the United States owing at the time of the enactment of the legal-tender law of 1862 were by the then existing laws payable in gold and silver. Those debts have been discharged to the amount of thousands of millions of dollars, and I tell gentlemen that when they undertake to pass this section they reopen this question and say that all the decisions pronounced heretofore upon preëxisting contracts of the United States in your own Court of Claims against creditors demanding payment in gold and silver or its equivalent are to be set aside, the accounts readjusted, and these parties paid the difference between what was understood at the time of the settlement of the claim to be the value of legal tenders and that of coin. No more destructive or injurious legislation than this could, in my judgment, be enacted by Congress.

Again, sir, the people of the United States have no security against that calamity which sooner or later overtakes all nations; and this legislation is calculated to induce the holders of money, in case the great calamity of war should again fall upon this country, to say to the Government bound by your own statute, if you could so bind it, "We loan you not a dollar except upon the condition of your law, that we shall be paid in gold and silver." I deny the power of Congress thus to fetter the sovereignty of the American people by any sort of legislation. Every man makes his contract within the jurisdiction of every sovereignty upon the face of the earth, subject to the condition, and it is of the essence of the contract when it comes to be enforced in the tribunals of the country in which the contract is made, that whatever shall be the legal tender on the day of judgment by the law of the sovereignty in which his contract is made, shall discharge the judgment. That, sir, is the law of every civilized country on the globe to-day. The Constitution is silent, as I said before, on the subject of legal tender, and as to the nationality, for the reason that it is the right of every nationality to change what shall be legal tender from day to day, within its own jurisdiction, as to contracts made within its jurisdiction at its pleasure, because the nation alone can by law declare what shall be a legal tender in every State and Territory of the Union, while the States alone are restricted to gold and silver as a legal tender. If the States were not so restricted, they might by law declare that the coin of the United States should not be a legal tender in discharge of debts, and thereby render void the express grant of power that Congress may coin money and fix its value and the value of all foreign coin.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise now to move to close the debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask my colleague to give me five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will give the gentleman five minutes, as this happens to be a provision that he originally introduced. After he has had five minutes I then hope it will be agreed, by unanimous consent, that debate shall be terminated.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the great consideration which underlies this section has not been touched, and I cannot but feel that the objection raised against it, that it is a dangerous law in aid of the debtor as against the creditor is entirely removed by the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and printed on the fifth page. I hope that amendment will be offered. I will offer it myself by the permission of my colleague.

Let me suggest to the House some of the considerations which led me to introduce on the 10th of February a bill almost identical with the language of this section. I desired that some steps should be taken toward the resumption of specie payment; and as part of the plan something should be done to keep our gold at home, and to permit the importation of foreign gold. Let me call attention to the following statement of the recent movement of gold:

Statement of the export of specie from the port of New York since January 1, 1868.

	Amount.
January.....	$7,399,825
February.....	4,203,829
March.....	3,694,912
April.....	6,095,179
May.....	15,936,231
June.....	11,383,031
July (two weeks).....	6,321,338

Total..... 55,378,860
Export for same period 1867..... 31,964,569

Excess of export this year..... $24,414,291

The export of gold from the port of New York for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868..... $76,236,594
Same for 1867..... 41,366,932

Increase of export for the year..... $34,869,662

Delivery of gold from the State of California for the year ending June 30, 1868..... $36,726,370
Ditto for 1867..... 38,385,562

Decrease for 1868..... $1,659,192

The export of gold from the port of New York the present fiscal year will fully equal (if it can be had) $100,000,000; or $60,000,000 more than the receipts from the mines.

Now, consider the movement of gold in Europe:

"At the close of April bullion and specie had accumulated in the eight leading European national banks to the vast amount of £89,719,862. Of this amount the Bank of France alone held £45,613,238, and the Bank of England £20,632,886. A month later the stock of bullion and specie held by the Bank of France had further increased to £47,910,840."

A London circular, dated June 27, says of the accumulation of the precious metals in the banks of France and England:

"The unusual spectacle is presented of the Bank of France having a larger amount of coin and bullion in its possession than the notes in circulation. Not only are these sums enormously greater than anything the Bank of England has to show, but they are remarkable as having been reached without any of those restrictions and limitations which are imposed by the English system. The Bank of England is also nearing an equality in the amount of bullion with the notes in circulation. The latter amount to £23,687,000, and the former (inclusive of the coin in the banking department) to £22,962,000. In the two great banking establishments a sum of £71,000,000 in gold and silver coin and bars is now stored, a collection of the precious metals such as have never hitherto been deemed possible. What the result may be upon monetary and commercial affairs it would be difficult to forecast. As such an equality of the metallic basis with its representative notes in cirlation is not at all necessary for perfect security, the natural result would be a gradual expansion of the currency in both countries, and thus a powerful stimulus would be given to speculative activity. This presupposes, however, a condition of confidence in the public mind which, neither politically nor commercially, is yet visible. It must come, however, with a good harvest and the disappearance of war rumors."

In the Bank of France there is an amount of gold far in excess of the circulation of that country, and the rate of interest is two and a half per cent. at the bank, and from one and a half to one and three quarters on the street. In eight kingdoms of Europe to-day there are $485,000,000 of idle gold waiting to be invested, if we will only make it lawful for it to be invested here without being tossed into the uncertain chances which are inseparable from our greenback currency. Every time we pay out fifty or one hundred million dollars of gold interest it immediately goes across the sea. A hundred thousand of our business men would immediately begin to transact their business on a gold basis if they were permitted to do so by the law, and by the amendment proposed by my colleague as a proviso to this section, I do not see how there could be oppression. Gentlemen speak as though it had never before been heard that a party should reckon interest beforehand in giving a note, and thus evade the usury laws. Gentlemen talk as if this was the first time there could be frauds committed and wrongs done to people who are debtors. This bill is not an instrument of oppression; but will lead us toward the firm ground of fixed values. I hope that the strange fear of gold which seems to have taken possession of many gentlemen here will not prevent the adoption of this section.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask that the debate be considered as closed on the pending amendments to the section and on striking out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate was ordered to be closed in five minutes; there are two minutes remaining.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not desire to occupy them.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia; and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. CAVANAUGH, to insert the words "or in gold dust according to its value."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the amendment by adding "and brick dust." [Laughter.]

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Perhaps the gentleman had better go out there and dig.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment of Mr. CAVANAUGH was then disagreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out the proviso now in the section, as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to contracts for the borrowing of currency or the removal or extension of an indebtedness under a contract already entered into, unless such contract originally required payment in coin.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following: Provided, however, That the consideration for any such contract made payable in coin shall be matter arising after the passage of this act, and no part of such consideration shall, in any case, be founded directly or indirectly on any previous indebtedness not payable in coin existing prior to, or at the date of, the passage of this act. And any evasion of, or attempt to evade this provision shall work a forfeiture of every such contract made under the authority of this section; but this shall not contravene any statute of any State or Territory relating to usury.

The question being put, there were—ayes 51, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and BINGHAM were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on striking out the section as amended.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend the section by inserting in the line after the word "contract" the words "in writing;" so that it will read "any contract in writing hereafter made," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to add the following proviso to the section:

And provided further that this section is enacted for the special benefit of the gold operators of Wall street.

Mr. PIKE. There ought to be another proviso "that this section is in anticipation of a decision of the Supreme Court next winter declaring the legal-tender act void." I would like to prepare for it in advance.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

The amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of the committee to strike out the section, it was agreed to—ayes eighty-one; noes not counted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had agreed to the committee of conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1869, and had appointed Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. MORRILL of Maine, managers of said conference on its part.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. STOKES: The petition of John E. Pyatt, J. C. Mason, W. N. Ault, and J. S. Abernethy, of Rhea county, Tennessee, to be relieved of political disabilities.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 18, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of citizens of New York, composing the United States Indian commission, a voluntary association recently formed, praying the adoption of measures for the better treatment of the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying an appropriation for the removal of rocks and other obstructions which impede the navigation of the East river entrance to New York harbor at Hell Gate, and for the removal of the rocks known as "Battery," "Diamond," and "Coenties" reefs; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented three petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying an increase of compensation; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POMEROY presented a memorial of Fisk Mills, in relation to the cancel abolishing return postage stamp or envelope currency; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the adoption of measures for the better treatment of the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom were referred the following petitions, memorials, and resolutions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A petition of presidents and officers of various railroads;

A memorial of the Memphis, El Paso, and Pacific Railroad Company;

A memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade;

A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minnesota;

A memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, in favor of a wagon-road;

A memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, in favor of a telegraph line;

A memorial of Israel Hall, Egbert Judson, and others;

A memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas;

Six joint resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, relating to the Pacific railroad and its branches;

Resolutions of the Legislature of California;

Resolutions of the constitutional convention of Georgia;

Resolutions of the Board of Trade of St. Louis, Missouri;

Resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota; and Resolutions of citizens of northern Minnesota.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1206) to restore to certain parties their rights under the laws and treaties of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of the St. Louis Board of Trade, asking the removal of the United States arsenal at that place, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1279) in relation to additional bounties, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 629) granting a pension to Mrs. Sallie Griffin; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CATTELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred resolutions of the constitutional convention of Georgia in favor of aid to southern planters, and resolutions of the constitutional convention of Mississippi, relative to the Freedmen's Bureau, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred petitions of mechanics of New York; a petition of mechanics and laboring men; and a petition of citizens of Ohio, in favor of the passage of the eight-hour law, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 343) to admit free of duty certain statuary, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 103) constituting eight hours a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the following bills, reported them without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 1302) granting a pension to Chauncey D. Rose, father of Alvin J. Rose, late a sergeant-veteran in company A, second regiment of Ohio cavalry volunteers, who was killed in action at Five Forks, Virginia, April 1, 1865;

A bill (H. R. No. 1393) granting a pension to Hugo Eichholtz;

A bill (H. R. No. 1394) granting a pension to Daniel Sheets;

A bill (H. R. No. 1395) granting a pension to Esther C. C. Vangilder, widow of Charles F. Vangilder, deceased, late a private in company M, first regiment Vermont heavy artillery volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Stephen T. Carver;

A bill (H. R. No. 1397) granting a pension to Prescott Y. Howland;

A bill (H. R. No. 1398) granting a pension to Martin Burke;

A bill (H. R. No. 1399) granting increased pension to William B. Edwards;

A bill (H. R. No. 1400) granting a pension to Jonathan H. Perry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to John La Marsh;

A bill (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to Catharine Skinner;

A bill (H. R. No. 1403) granting a pension to Helen L. Wolf;

A bill (H. R. No. 1404) granting a pension to William Smith;

A bill (H. R. No. 1405) granting a pension to Elizabeth Lamar;

A bill (H. R. No. 1406) granting a pension to Patrick Collins;

A bill (H. R. No. 1407) granting a pension to John Gridley;

A bill (H. R. No. 1408) granting a pension to Catherine Gensler;

A bill (H. R. No. 1409) granting a pension to Asa F. Holcomb;

A bill (H. R. No. 1410) granting back pension to the minor children of Joseph Berry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1411) granting a pension to Polly W. Cotton;

A bill (H. R. No. 1412) granting a pension to the children of William B. Silvey;

A bill (H. R. No. 1413) granting a pension to Jane Rook;

A bill (H. R. No. 1414) granting a pension to Sarah K. Johnson; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1420) directing the Commissioner of Pensions to proceed to hear evidence and determine the right of W. H. Cox, deceased, late a sergeant in company F, second regiment Pennsylvania artillery, to a pension in same manner as if he was still living, he having died of disease contracted while a prisoner of war at Andersonville, Georgia, and if found to be entitled to a pension, then the same, from time of his discharge till death, to be paid over to his father, Charles D. Cox.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Nancy A. Stocks, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 630) granting increase of pension to Nancy A. Stocks. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 606) granting a pension to Robert Watson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

COMMANDER A. K. HUGHES.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NYE. That is a report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, on which all agree, and I should like its present consideration.

No objection being made, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to authorize the President to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, Commander Aaron K. Hughes to the active list of the Navy, with the rank to which he may be entitled thereon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a very important matter; it ought to be understood. Is it reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir; I have the papers here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is it consented to by the Navy Department and by the Naval Committee unanimously.

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TIPTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 631) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Nebraska City, in the State of Nebraska, to intersect with the Union Pacific railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 165) authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to appoint guardians or trustees for minor Indian children who may be entitled to pensions or bounties under the existing laws; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 166) declaring the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CATTELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 632) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund penalty, interest, and costs illegally assessed and collected under direct tax laws; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF TAX BILL.

Mr. CORBETT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved. That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand copies of the tax bill recently passed at the present session, as the same became a law.

SUITS AGAINST CORPORATIONS.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 610) in relation to corporations created by laws of the United States, which had been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was in line three, after the word "corporation" to insert "other than a banking corporation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after "therefor," in line nine, to insert "verified by oath."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the words "issue joined," in line ten, to insert "showing a defense arising under or by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend that amendment of the committee by striking out the word "showing" and inserting in lieu of it "stating that the party has."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, reads thus:

Be it enacted, &c., That any corporation, other than a banking corporation, organized under a law of the United States, and against which a suit at law or in equity has been or may be commenced in any court other than a circuit or district court of the United States, may have such suit removed from the court in which it may be pending to the proper circuit or district court of the United States, upon filing a petition therefor, verified by oath, either before or after issue joined, stating that the party has a defense arising under or by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, and offering good and sufficient surety for entering in such court on the first day of its session, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suit, and doing such other appropriate acts as are required to be done by the act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts," approved July 27, 1866, and it shall be thereupon the duty of the court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the suit; and the said copies being entered as aforesaid in such court of the United States, the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process, and all the provisions of said act in this section referred to, respecting any bail, attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, and respecting any bond of indemnity or other obligation, given upon the issuing or granting of any attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, shall apply with like force and effect in all respects to similar matters, process, or things in the suits for the removal of which this act provides.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say that while I do not oppose the passage of this bill I think the law ought to regulate all such questions in one act. As I was not present when this bill was considered in the committee, I think it right to say that I do not wish to be considered as either approving or disapproving of the special object which this bill is supposed to have in view.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee if this bill makes any further provision for the transfer of cases than is authorized or appears on the face of the Constitution? The jurisdiction of the United States courts seems to be confined there. I do not know the purport of the amendment the committee have offered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly not. We do not suppose that Congress has any authority to confer any other jurisdiction than such as is warranted by the Constitution; but the understanding of the committee was that corporations created by act of Congress had a right to be heard in the United States courts in cases arising under the laws of the United States, where it is shown that a defense arises under the laws of the United States.

Mr. COLE. Does this preclude parties from litigating with such companies in any of the State or territorial courts?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all. It merely provides for a transfer on the fact being alleged, verified by the oath of the party, showing the fact on the part of a corporation created by the laws of the United States, that it has a defense arising under or by virtue of the Constitution of the United States or some treaty or law of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to put a question to the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. Does this bill, which I have not had time to read, apply to the branches of the Union Pacific railroad as well as to the main corporation known as the Union Pacific railroad? There are the Kansas branch, the Sioux City branch, and various other branches, and branches in California. Does it apply to all those branches?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That would be a matter of construction dependent on a matter of fact as to whether they are incorporated by the United States. The bill is general in its terms and applies to any corporation other than a banking corporation organized under a law of the United States. I do not understand that those branches are organized under a law of the United States, but if they are they would come within the purview of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. They do not exist by virtue of charters granted by the United States, but their charters are either territorial or State charters, and they receive subsidies in lands or money from the United States, and there is a vast body of legislation applicable to them. Now, I submit to the honorable Senator whether it is best to apply this statute to the branches as well as to the main trunk. I would not leave that doubtful, it seems to me.

Mr. COLE. Almost all the litigation that can arise in reference to matters pertaining to the Pacific railroad must arise out of a law passed by Congress; and if all such cases may be transferred to the United States courts it amounts, in my judgment, to denying a remedy to parties living in the Territories. If any person having a cause of action against a railroad company in the Territories of the United States is obliged to be transferred for his litigation to the United States courts he certainly will find it very difficult to prosecute his rights, or to get his remedy. I do not know what the particular reason for the passage of this bill is; but if it amounts to this, that persons are to be denied their right to litigate in the territorial courts or the State courts it seems to me to be going altogether too far; it virtually denies the right to bring suits against railroad corporations when they are incorporated by the United States, because all their suits spring out of the law of Congress, or may be alleged to spring from causes existing in the law of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should be as averse as the Senator from California to increasing the jurisdiction of the United States courts unnecessarily. I think it bad legislation to be crowding those courts with business that can be as well done in the State tribunals; and as an individual member of the Judiciary Committee I have always resisted all legislation of this kind, unless there seemed to be a necessity to answer the ends of justice that parties should have an opportunity to take cases to the courts of the United States. Of the constitutionality of a law that authorizes a transfer of a cause from a State to a United States court, where a right is claimed under the Constitution of the United States, or some treaty or law of Congress, there can, I think, be no doubt. But this jurisdiction is not exclusive; the State courts may still entertain jurisdiction of cases by and against corporations organized under the laws of the United States, notwithstanding the passage of this bill; but a corporation thus organized would have the right, on showing by affidavit that it had a defense based upon a law or treaty of the United States or the Constitution, to remove the cause into the United States courts.

It has no reference in terms to the Pacific railroad or any other railroad, but I suppose it had its origin, perhaps, in suits that are being instituted against the Pacific Railroad Company in the city of New York or elsewhere, by way of injunction, restraining their operations. This has become a great evil in the country. The directors of our great lines of railroad, like the Erie road, like the road stretching from Chicago by way of Rock Island to Omaha, and other large roads, are being frequently enjoined by some inferior judge in the city of New York against going on with these great works; and though this bill does not reach to the cases of corporations created by the States, we did suppose that it was competent for the United States to protect its own corporations organized under its authority from injunctions granted by some recorder or inferior judge in the city of New York, by authorizing the company to take such causes into the United States courts for adjudication. That is the extent of this bill, and it goes so far and no farther, to protect corporations organized by authority of Congress, by allowing them to appeal to the courts organized under authority of Congress for redress.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, after all I do not see that the remedy that the honorable chairman of the committee speaks of will be effected by the passage of this bill, because in case an injunction is sought in the city of New York in a State court it will only amount to a privilege of transferring it to a United States court.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is all.

Mr. COLE. Wherein, then, is the company better off in the United States courts than in the State courts? Let me suppose there is a cause of action arising in Utah against a railroad company for some cause, no matter what, it is within the power of that company to transfer that case a thousand miles—any distance if you please—away from where the cause of action arose, and the party can only reach it over the railroad of the company itself. It gives them very great advantages in litigation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The case can only be taken to the proper district. It can only be removed to the United States court for the proper district where it arises; and in the Territories no such question will arise, because the Territories have no United States circuit and district courts; the territorial courts are United States courts themselves. This bill does not authorize the removal of a cause from the Territory of Utah to the United States court in the State of New York. Every case in the Territory of Utah is tried in a United States court there, and you may go by appeal directly from the territorial courts to the Supreme Court of the United States. The trouble does not arise there; it arises from actions brought in the States.

Mr. COLE. In my judgment this is virtually denying to any person having a cause of action against a railroad company chartered by the United States his remedy in any State court, and it seems to me that it will be an outrage upon any person that has a cause of action against one of these railroad companies. I wish the bill would be allowed to go over until it can have further consideration. It has been on our tables for a day or two; and I do not think it ought to pass thus hastily. It is a matter of great deal more importance, in my judgment, than appears on its face or than is illustrated by the example stated by the honorable chairman of the committee. It is broader in its operations, I believe, than appears from what has been stated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is nothing covert in the bill, so far as I am advised.

Mr. COLE. They have a right now in certain cases to transfer their causes to the United States courts under existing statutes, and they are sufficiently protected, in my opinion, by laws already in existence. This bill gives them much more than they are entitled to now. They have a right now to go into the United States courts in certain cases; this is a proposition to extend that right beyond what is now provided by law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the importance of this bill will depend to some extent upon one question: how far we have created corporations within the District of Columbia which corporations may exercise their powers in the States with the consent of the States. If all these corporations, insurance companies, and manufacturing companies, and mining companies, can go out into the States and exercise their powers there, with the assent of the States, then I suppose that whole class of corporations will fall under the operation of this bill.

I cannot fail to be impressed with the suggestion of the Senator from California, that in regard to these railroad companies it is giving to them a very dangerous right when they come in litigation and competition with the citizen. Suppose a citizen sues for material taken off his land, wood taken, stock killed, or any of those little cases that arise in the neighborhood where he ought to have his remedy at once convenient to his witnesses, the railroad company for the purpose of vexing him may take a transfer to the United States court. Is not that a substantial denial of justice to the party?

Mr. COLE. Of course it is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It certainly is known to Senators that in a controversy of that sort the citizen has no equal chance in the courts of the United States with these corporations. A few years of litigation there would eat up a small estate. And, sir, I say that it is a dangerous thing to extend the jurisdiction of the United States courts. We have been doing it from session to session at a very dangerous rate, in my judgment. They are necessarily very expensive courts in which to litigate between parties; and especially dangerous when you give the right to one side to take his case to the Federal court and deny it to the other, as in this bill, the one party being a strong, powerful corporation, the other, perhaps a poor citizen, who may not be able to follow his case from court to court in the Federal judicial system.

So far as the constitutional question suggested by the chairman of the committee is concerned, I do not doubt that the right of transfer may be given where the question involves a right that is conferred by a law of the United States; but how far is that to be construed as extending? If the courts will stand by the letter of that provision there is not so much danger to be apprehended; but if the courts shall go so far as is suggested by the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, if they go so far as to say that this law is intended to protect corporations created by the laws of the United States in all of their litigation; in other words, that simply because a corporation has been created by the United States, therefore its cause may go to the courts of the United States, it will be a very dangerous construction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not the bill as the Senator will see, if he will look at it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think it is; but I understood the argument of the Senator to be that Congress had the right to provide so as to protect its own corporations.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think so, so far as its laws go. Of course it would not protect them in regard to matters not arising under its own laws. But the bill was amended in the Judiciary Committee—I am not sure whether the Senator from Indiana was present or not—for the very purpose of carrying out his suggestion. If he will look at the amended bill he will see that it requires that a petition shall be filed, verified by oath, stating that the case does arise under some law of Congress or a treaty or the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no question that, the letter of this law being adhered to by the courts, the danger is not so great as I apprehended, when you take that in connection with the former provision, that it must be a corporation created by the laws of the United States. I think any one may safely have the right to transfer a cause to the United States courts where his right depends upon a law of the United States. We have gone much further than that, and have provided that where his defense rests not upon a law, but upon an order or authority of any officer of the United States, there may be a transfer. So far as the constitutional question is concerned this bill is not so objectionable, in my judgment, as many bills we have already passed; but I think it is liable to that construction which is hurtful to the cause of justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COLE and Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Welch, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Davis, Harlan, Hendricks, McCreery, Morton, Pomeroy, Ross, Sprague, Vickers, Wade, and Williams—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Chandler, Corbett, Dixon, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Kellogg, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Rice, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Whyte—29.

So the bill was passed.

PRINTING OF THE TAX BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand copies of the tax bill, have instructed me to report it back, with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand copies of the tax bill recently passed at the present session, as the same became a law.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to add the words "with the index prepared for the edition ordered by the House of Representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1284) to change and more effectually secure the collection of internal taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and to amend the tax on banks.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 622 to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I object to the taking up of that bill at this time. I understood yesterday that that bill had been recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I was not aware that it had been reported again. Accompanying the bill was quite an extensive report prepared under the superintendence of a distinguished engineer in the Government service, and that I believe was ordered to be printed, but has not been laid on our tables. This is a matter of great interest to my constituents, and I should prefer that the bill should lie over until that report can be seen. The reading of it was commenced in committee, but it was obliged to be laid aside in consequence of other business, and I have not been able to see it. I hope the bill will not be taken up at this time. I desire to take up a bill of much more general interest if I can get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MORTON. It is not possible for the Senate to take up a bill of more general interest than this, because there is no such bill pending before the Senate, in my opinion. The report to which the Senator refers has been printed. This measure has been before the committee to which the Senator belongs for a long time, and he understands it exactly. It is in regard to bridging the Ohio river, about which there is a good deal of interest felt, and in regard to which there are great interests depending. It ought to be considered at this session of Congress for the reason that there are two or three bridges which will be built, perhaps, this summer, unless action is taken, which will be an obstruction to navigation and which the Government will undoubtedly have to pull down hereafter and pay for as in the case of the Rock Island bridge. It is a matter of the utmost importance that this bill should be considered, and if it is not done to-day it will be too late. I ask that the bill may be taken up.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be very happy to consider the bill of the Senator from Indiana at some other time. I have made repeated efforts to get up the Central Branch Union Pacific railroad bill, which has been discussed so much, and I was in hopes this forenoon that I should be able to succeed in obtaining the final action of the Senate upon it. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will consent to take it up. I do not think it will occupy much time. I think we shall be able to dispose of it in the course of twenty minutes or half an hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No; not in two hours.

Mr. HOWARD. I think we can. I dislike very much to antagonize my bill against that of the Senator from Indiana; but I announce to him that I shall move to take up this one if the motion to take up his fails.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust we shall take up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Indiana. It is one of vast importance to my constituents, and it will take but a few minutes to pass it. There can hardly be an objection to it except from some little interest at the headwaters of the stream; but to the people below it is a question of great magnitude, because the whole commerce of the river is now very much in danger by these bridges. I trust the bill will be taken up.

Mr. POMEROY. The last action I know anything about of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which I am a member, and I have attended all the meetings, was that we voted to report this bill in order that the report accompanying it might be printed for the use of the Senate, and then to have it recommitted to the committee. I do not know of any action beyond that. If the bill is before the Senate for any action by any report of the committee, it is unknown to me. The report to which reference has been made is said to be very elaborate. I have never read it, but I intended to read it whenever it was printed. The Senator from Indiana says it is printed. The order to print was made yesterday, and if it is printed I have not seen it.

Mr. MORTON. It is here to-day.

Mr. POMEROY. Perhaps other Senators have it. I have not seen a copy of it. I should be glad to have a portion of that report read when the bill is considered. I shall place no obstacle in the way of considering the bill, but it is pretty early to consider it before we have had an opportunity to see the report in print.

Mr. RAMSEY. In answer to the Senator with reference to the recommitment of the bill to the committee I have this to say: the parties in interest were so very anxious to have a report, that we reported the bill leaving one or two blanks in it, those blanks being as to the size of the spans of the bridges, with the understanding that after the bill was printed it should be recommitted to the committee for the purpose of filling those blanks.

Mr. POMEROY. So I understood.

Mr. RAMSEY. Upon my motion it was recommitted to the committee, and upon a consultation with a majority of the members of the committee they directed the size of the spans which the Senator will find in the bill as read.

Mr. POMEROY. When was it recommitted?

Mr. RAMSEY. Recommitted yesterday, and reported back yesterday.

Mr. POMEROY. Did the committee have any meeting in the mean time?

Mr. RAMSEY. Not a formal meeting, but such a meeting as we usually have at this late day of the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—yeas 26, nays 15; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 622) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river. The bill provides that any bridge hereafter erected across the Ohio river shall be made with continuous or unbroken spans, and the span across the main low-water channel shall not be of less elevation than ninety feet above low-water mark, nor less than forty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, measuring for such elevation to the bottom chord of the bridge. All the spans other than the one over the main low-water channel are to be at least — feet in length in the clear, and the span covering the main low-water channel of the river is to be of such length as to leave at least — hundred feet of unobstructed passage-way for navigation at all stages; but the Secretary of War, after a full examination of each case, is to determine this width of passage adequate to the wants of navigation.

A bridge built under the provisions of the act is to be located in such places and in such manner as to be at right angles with the direction of the current in the main channel of the river at all stages, so that the piers of the bridge may be always parallel to the current in the main channel; and the location of the bridge is also to be such that the current of the main channel shall move in a straight line from a point at least one thousand feet above the bridge to a point five hundred feet below the bridge. And no rip-rap or other material is to be placed around the bases of the piers or abutments to compensate for inadequate foundations, which material shall contract the passage-way hereinbefore provided, or which shall injuriously affect the regimen of the river. Any person, company, or corporation, authorized to construct a bridge across the Ohio river by the States upon whose territory the bridge will abut, is to submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination, a design of the bridge and piers, and a map of the location, giving for the space of at least one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore lines at high and low water, the direction of the current at all stages, and the soundings accurately showing the bed of the stream, and furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject by the Secretary of War; and if the Secretary of War is satisfied that the provisions of the law have been complied with in regard to location, the building of the piers may be at once commenced; but if it shall appear that the conditions prescribed can not be complied with at the location where it is desired to construct the bridge, the Secretary of War shall detail a board, composed of three experienced officers of the corps of engineers, to examine the case, and may, on their recommendation, authorize the building of the bridge at the proposed location on such increased length of spans across the channel-way as the board may deem sufficient to secure a passage-way that shall not unnecessarily obstruct the navigation of the river. Any person, company, or corporation constructing a bridge under the act is to take all necessary measures to prevent any change occurring in the river bed, after work shall have been commenced, that would injuriously affect the navigation of the river, and shall not, during the construction of the bridge, obstruct the navigation of the river in any way that will not at all times leave a passage-way equivalent to that heretofore provided in the act. Any bridge constructed under the act, and according to its limitations, is to be a lawful structure, and to be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge is to be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the bridge; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the navigation of the river created by the construction of any bridge under the act the cause or question arising may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of the obstruction or bridge touches. The right to alter or amend the act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of the river by the construction of bridges is expressly reserved.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line ten, to fill the blank by inserting the words "two hundred and fifty;" so that the clause will read:

All the spans other than the one over the main low-water channel shall be at least two hundred and fifty feet length in the clear.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I feel myself placed in a somewhat embarrassing position on account of what I have already stated. I expected to receive the report of the committee and learn from that why two hundred and fifty feet exactly in this case should be necessary. I have heard no reason for it, and do not expect to hear any satisfactory one. It appears that this bill, according to the confession of the Senator from Indiana, is aimed at two bridges now in process of construction in which my constituents are deeply interested. It appears that those bridges are to be sacrificed; for what object I am unable to tell. If there is any reason, such as General Warren, United States engineer, upon whose authority I understand this report is based, could give, why these spans should be two hundred and fifty feet, no more and no less, I should like to hear it. This is the first time, I believe, that such a provision was ever introduced into a bridge bill. The bill upon which my friends are acting and upon which those bridges are being built only requires the span over the main channel to be of a certain length, leaving them to construct the spans that are erected in the lowest water near the shores at such lengths as suit their convenience.

But, sir, this amendment alone does not present the whole question that will be agitated in this bill. I understand that the other blank is to be filled with "five hundred," which is to be the length of a single span across the Ohio river, where the channel is never half that width.

The bridges that I speak of have been proceeding under an act of Congress passed in July, 1862, defining as particularly as it could all the matters in relation to those bridges, how they were to be constructed, what width their spans were to be, how high the structure was to be above low water, and how high above high water. Every particular that could be ascertained at the time was put into the bill. It is as particular as this, at least, although it differs from it in one or two respects. Under that law some two or three hundred thousand dollars have already been expended; indeed, a great deal has been expended, for one bridge has been entirely built and is now in operation under that law, namely, the bridge at Steubenville, and two others are in process of construction. They are now about, while the water is low, to commence the structure of piers in the river. This bill is brought forward just in time, if it should be passed, even if you make the spans less than is proposed, to create a delay in the construction of those bridges, because they will be required to obtain the opinion of the Secretary of War and of a board of engineers to be selected by him, and thus the building of the bridges will be put back at least one year, and the interest on the money already expended will be lost, and probably the materials collected for the purpose will greatly deteriorate.

It is very easy for the Chamber of Commerce or the Board of Trade of Cincinnati to take a notion that they know all about bridges and say that bridges must have five hundred feet span over the main low-water channel above Parkersburg as well as at Cincinnati, where it is wider. But in the narrow channel between Parkersburg and Pittsburg I doubt very much if there is a channel of the river itself which is over three hundred feet in width.

The law of which I have spoken was passed by Congress after the deliberations of a board of civil engineers from every part of the United States convened at St. Louis to consider the subject. Among them was Mr. McAlpine, from Boston, an engineer from Rhode Island, several engineers from New York, and from the western States, consisting, I think, of twenty-five in all. This board considered all these questions about the river, about the navigation, about the kind of craft used upon it, and they solemnly determined that three hundred feet were sufficient for the main span, and determined that the adjoining span should be two hundred and twenty feet, leaving to the companies constructing the bridges to make the others as they saw fit. I have here a copy of their report, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some extracts from it.

These gentlemen were among the most distinguished engineers in the United States, and on taking his seat Mr. McAlpine, of Massachusetts, who had been elected their president, spoke of the gentlemen of whom the board was composed in high terms. He said they were engineers who had already made their names in the United States and who had a national reputation. I merely wish to show by these remarks that this was not a set of engineers gathered together for the purpose of accomplishing a single project or carrying out the views of a single bridge company; but they were engineers selected for their eminence from every part of the United States, to whom was referred the decision of this question. They did decide it; and as I have already stated, under their decision and the good faith of the United States pledged by the act of 1862, one bridge has been already constructed and two others are in process of construction, and against those two this bill is aimed. It is not a regard, I am afraid, for the navigation of the river, but it is a regard to the interests of different railroad companies. Continue the bridge at Steubenville and stop the bridges below it, and the fate of the railroads running through West Virginia and Maryland is very distinctly known.

I ask leave to read a few extracts from the conclusions of this board, which will explain this subject better than I can. They also considered all the questions involved in the construction of a bridge at St. Louis over the Mississippi, I believe. The bridge company there had the privilege of erecting one span of five hundred feet in length or two spans of three hundred and eighty-four feet in length, and the decision of the board was decidedly against the erection of the span of five hundred feet.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to call for the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States, is before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I hope we shall be allowed to finish this bridge bill. It is a very important bill, and will have to go to the House.

Mr. STEWART. It will be debated all day.

Mr. MORTON. I think not. I do not think it will take over an hour. I am very anxious to take up the bill which is the special order, but I hope we shall be allowed to dispose of this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I have only a general interest, the interest of all other Senators in the special order. The Senator knows how long and how often it has been postponed. I know the interest felt in the pending measure, and I know, too, how near we are to the close of the session; and if the bridge bill can be passed in a comparatively short time, and the Senate will agree to it, I will consent to let it go on, if it will not occupy more than half an hour or an hour.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think it will. Mr. CONNESS. The special order can lie over informally for that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the special order can be passed over informally. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senate to take up House joint resolution, No. 343, allowing a cap for a monument about being erected in the city of Harrisburg to the slain of the Mexican war to be admitted free of duty. It will not take a moment. It has passed the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORTON. I cannot consent to that. I am going upon borrowed time myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 622) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river is before the Senate, and the Senator from West Virginia has the floor upon it.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Mr. President, I was adverting to the report of the board of engineers, on which the law I have already spoken of was passed, and under which the bridges that I represent here in my locality are being constructed. I wish to read a few short extracts from a longer report now in the hands of the Senator from Indiana. As we cannot get any other reports to know whether this is right or wrong I shall be inclined to rely on this report of twenty-five civil engineers; one of them, however, being from the United States Army.

I have already stated that the question first presented to them was as to the feasibility and propriety of erecting a single span of five hundred feet, or two separate spans of three hundred and eighty-four feet, and the decision was in favor of two spans of three hundred and eighty-four feet. If I can have the attention of the Senate, I desire to read a few passages from their report:

"Resolved, That we, as practical engineers, cannot conscientiously recommend to the parties in interest, to venture upon the construction of spans of as great length as the maximum one prescribed by law—

That is, five hundred feet—

"and that, therefore, we do recommend for adoption the minimum spans allowed by the law, as more economical, less hazardous in construction and maintenance, and affording ample accommodation to the commerce of the river at the port of St. Louis."

It was also—

"Resolved, That in view of all the circumstances of this case, we would recommend spans of less than three hundred and fifty feet in the clear, if the Federal law permitted of such reduction."

The report of another committee of that body says:

"That under the circumstances of the case, it is expedient to construct the spans over the main channel of three hundred and fifty feet in the clear."

And they expressed by resolution—

"Their unqualified disapprobation of spans of five hundred feet."

Now, sir, I should like to call attention to this paragraph to show how private property may be destroyed for a mere notion, as I think this idea of a five hundred feet span is:

"It was proved in joint committee that the cost of a span of five hundred and twenty feet (five hundred feet in the clear,) will be more than twice as great per foot of bridge as a span of three hundred and sixty-eight feet (three hundred and fifty feet in the clear) and not less than three times as great as a span of three hundred and four feet; consequently, the cost of one span of five hundred and twenty feet will be equal to two spans of three hundred and sixty-eight feet, and one and a half spans of two hundred and sixty-four feet; that is, for the cost of one span of five hundred and twenty feet, no less than eleven hundred and fifty feet of bridge in spans of three hundred and sixty-eight feet and two hundred and sixty-four feet may be built."

Mr. President, I have said, and I am bound to believe until I see something to the contrary from some authoritative source, that this idea of a five hundred feet span is a mere notion gotten up by one opposing interest against another; and I should like to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to something practical on the subject. Four hundred feet is six times the length of this Senate Chamber, and five hundred feet in the clear would be about seven times as long as this Senate Chamber. I ask Senators to imagine that the space from one extreme of the gallery across to the other was seven times as long without any intermediate support whatever, and a railroad train of some three or four hundred tons were to be placed upon it. It is almost utterly impossible to find any material that will be strong enough to bear such a weight for such a span at anything like a reasonable expense, or any expense which could be well incurred in this country. I know that the tubular bridge is nearly five hundred feet in its span; but we all know that is a work erected where money was not scarce as it is here. That it is practicable to do it, there can be no question. That a five hundred feet span may be constructed, I have no doubt. Sir, there is no doubt that a ten thousand feet span could be constructed if we could find material that would not crush itself to destruction by its own weight. We are limited in these things by the nature of the materials we are to work with; and I believe a five hundred feet span bridge comes very near the limit of our materials. There is no bridge in this country of that span, and all the manufacturers of bridges that I have seen recommend that it should not be so long; and I know there was a doubt when the law was passed requiring the spans to be three hundred feet about their stability if built in the ordinary way; but unquestionably they can be built.

Now, sir, what are we subjected to? Now that we, relying on the faith of this law, passed after such deliberation as it received, and the views of skillful and competent engineers, have commenced these bridges, and spent perhaps two or three hundred thousand dollars upon them, they are to be arbitrarily charged at an immense expense to those engaged in the work. I have no hesitation in saying that between the three and five hundred feet span—I say it on the authority of engineers and upon what must be reasonable to everybody—whether that bridge is built of wood or iron, or compounded of both, the necessary and unavoidable consequence is that the long span will cost more than three times as much as the short one. It is true two hundred feet more will be covered; but in every way the expense must be very great. In the first place, the piers that are to be built to support the longer span must be stouter in every way, and heavier than those built to sustain a span of three hundred feet, and, as I have already said, the materials must be heavier. Every rod that is used in its construction must be more than double the weight. This whole chord has to go for five hundred feet, and yet it must be so managed that it is as strong in the center as in the ends where it rests on the piers. Every one must see that it is a mechanical impossibility to construct such a bridge at anything like the rate it would take for a three hundred feet span.

I will also advert to the fact that probably the navigation of the river would be much more damaged by the increased size of the piers which a five hundred feet span would render necessary than it would be by the narrow span. I have very little doubt of this in such a river as the Ohio where the natural channel is very narrow.

Sir, I should like to know what is to be gained by this; and I should like to have some scientific answer at least to that question, not mere notions of people who do not live on that river and know nothing about it. I want to know what is to be gained by it. All I hear in reference to that is that it is to permit the boats towing barges of coal from Pittsburg to go down the river without having a very good pilot I suppose. Mr. Roberts, the United States engineer now in charge of the Ohio river, came before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I had a conversation with him. I learned from him that a steamboat with her barges loaded with coal will occupy a front of one hundred and forty feet. The information in this report is that they occupy one hundred and twenty-five feet. But take it the one or the other, I ask whether, with skillful pilotage, such a raft might not be got through a span of three hundred feet without accident, under ordinary circumstances? The thing is palpable, or ought to be palpable, to the judgment of every man. But I asked Mr. Roberts further whether it was necessary to the safe navigation of the river, or to the convenience even of those engaged in it, that those rafts or boats should be so wide, and he said no. I asked him if it was not easy for them to adapt themselves to the three hundred feet span, and he said it was. Because it would be more convenient for a few coal boatmen living at Pittsburg, who are careless and reckless, and whose boats lie scattered at all times all along the Ohio river wherever there is a shoal or a dangerous place, to save them a little effort of rigging their boats together in a different way, this great evil to those whom I represent is to be incurred.

It appears to me that the object to be attained by this measure does not warrant subjecting us to so great an expense. If the Senator from Indiana chooses to except my part of the river from the operation of his bill I have nothing more to say except in reference to what I consider the folly and the danger of constructing a span of five hundred feet. Say as you will, put all the science you can on it, put all the skill in construction you can on it, increase the weight of your material as much as it will possibly bear, and yet it must stand evident to every one that it must be dangerous for a rolling train, impelled by an engine composed of different pieces, that is, of different cars and the engine, to cross any bridge of an elevation of ninety feet with a five hundred feet span. Let me read a little further from this report:

"The joint committee on the regimen of the river, on the foundations and piers, and on the superstructure, discussed the alternate proviso of the law in regard to the length of the spans across the main channel, and unanimously agreed that it was inadvisable to adopt the span of five hundred feet clear opening, on account of the difficulty of procuring suitable materials of the proper form, size, and workmanship required to meet the extraordinary strains to which some of the members of the truss would be subjected; the increased hazard of its construction and maintenance; the large additional cost of the whole structure by the use of the long span, and because the necessities of this case do not require the use of one of such great length, for which there is no engineering precedent."

Under all these circumstances, having acted under the faith of the law provided under the circumstances this law was, we are now called upon to build our bridges against our own will, against our own convictions of a length of span which is said here, almost in so many words, to be dangerous, and of which it is said there is no engineering precedent. Let me read a little further:

"The report gives the dimensions of a number of steamboats, varying from two hundred and thirty-five feet length over all, by sixty-one feet breadth of beam over all, to the Great Republic, the largest steamer afloat on the western rivers, which measures three hundred and thirty-six feet length over all, by ninety-six feet breadth of beam, and proceeds as follows:

"The principal spans, as determined by the law of Congress, are established at either five hundred feet, or three hundred and fifty feet; now a comparison of the foregoing data with these lengths of span shows that the largest boat on the river would not occupy one quarter of the width of even the smallest span allowed by law, or with a tow of barges, less than one-half the width."

"We think there can hardly be a doubt in the mind of any intelligent man, but that the span of three hundred and fifty feet is abundantly large to enable a free and unrestricted passage at all times."

I wish the Senate particularly to consider what is the object to be attained by this measure and what is the injury to be done. The object to be attained is a very uncertain one. We have some practical knowledge of a bridge of three hundred feet span. The bridge at Steubenville, on the line now of the Pennsylvania Central railroad, connecting with Columbus and other places West, has been built, and has a three hundred feet span. A great outcry has been made about the damage done at that bridge. No steamboat has ever struck on that bridge. A few coal boats have been wrecked there, not exceeding fifteen in all. It is ascertained that approaching the bridge from above the current appears to deflect, when in fact it goes straight on. It is only an act of time for these raft-men to become acquainted with it, and they can go through that just as well as if it had a five hundred feet span. That is the whole mystery of the Steubenville bridge. That is the whole injury that has been accomplished thus far. As I said before, and as anybody traveling on the upper Ohio will know, these coal boatmen have a sort of faculty of running their boats aground. In fact they are steered with difficulty. They have an oar sticking out at the stern, which they call a steering oar, but the vessel could not very well get around a few feet without the use of a long sweep at the bow. They are generally square at both ends, with a flat bottom, and such a thing as steering them would not be attempted perhaps anywhere else.

I asked this engineer from Pittsburg, who came here to represent, as I understood, the interest of Pittsburg, although he was in the employ of the Government of the United States in charge of the improvements going on upon the Ohio river, how these coal barges were built. I asked him if they could not be made to steer better, and he confessed that they could. So it seems that even if this is the evil that is to be guarded against, if it is simply to let these coal barges down without unlashing their boats or without lashing them properly before they start, even that can be avoided, because if they can get steering-way on them it is certainly possible for them to pass this bridge without injury. This bill, I see, requires that the channel shall run in a straight line for one thousand feet before it approaches the bridge, and that the piers of the bridge shall be built parallel with the channel; and such is the former law. Well, sir, with a great wind we know that even steamboats themselves cannot navigate well; but in ordinary circumstances it appears to me that a fleet of coal boats with a steamboat in the center of the breadth stated as the maximum by Mr. Roberts, one hundred and forty-two feet, can, without injury, be got through a span of three hundred feet.

We had before the Senate a year or two ago the case of the Clinton bridge across the Mississippi. That bridge had been built before the passage of the bridge law. It is a draw-bridge, and the opening between the pivot of the draw and the pier is a great deal less than three hundred feet. Efforts were made to prove that that was a most dangerous place, but the evidence brought before the committee fully disproved that assertion, although it was stated that the channel above, owing to a point of land, which I suppose could be removed, was curved; and yet a rigid account kept of all the accidents at that bridge showed that what had occurred were the result of carelessness of the parties or certain circumstances that were unavoidable; as, for instance, on a dark, foggy morning some boats attempted to pass the bridge from above, and they were injured; but the damage was not extensive.

Now, sir, I ask Senators to reflect that what is possible elsewhere will be possible on the Ohio river. I ask them also to reflect that at the ordinary stage of water it is exceedingly doubtful to my mind whether there is in the Ohio river, that is in the coal-boat stage, any natural channel over three hundred feet; and why five hundred feet is required to strike the channel they must keep is more than I can imagine. In several of the dangerous places on that river, the shoal places, where boats are compelled to go through a much narrower space than three hundred feet, they do it a great part of the time, but by carelessness sometimes run their boats ashore. I do not believe the danger from a two hundred feet span bridge would be as great to these coal boats as the natural obstructions to the river now at the stage of water in which they use it.

Mr. President, I think I am all alone in this matter. I do not know anybody that possesses the same interest in it. I do not know that I have even the sympathy of any others with me; but I think the case is one of great injustice toward these bridges. I shall offer an amendment to the effect, at least, that these bridges shall be exempt; that so much of the Ohio river as is above the Little Kanawha, immediately above which is the first bridge that is constructing, be excluded from the operations of this bill.

Mr. MORTON. I confess no little surprise at the statement which has been made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia. In the first place, I am surprised that he has read, not from an official report, but a report of a number of engineers collected in the interest of what was called the Boomer Company, of Chicago. There were companies competing for the right to build a bridge across the Mississippi river at St. Louis. One was called the Eads Company, proposing to build a five hundred feet span, and the other called the Boomer Company, proposing to build a three hundred feet span, and each company had engineers in its own interest. The Senator reads from the report of the Boomer Company proposing to build a bridge with a three hundred feet span. The Senator ought to know that that report has been repudiated by the Boomer Company itself; that that plan has been abandoned; that the five hundred feet span has been adopted; that the Boomer Company has come in and consolidated with the Eads Company on the five hundred feet span, agreeing to build a bridge with one span of five hundred feet, and the other two four hundred and ninety-seven feet each. Only the other day the Senate was called upon to pass a bill authorizing the consolidation of those two companies on the plan of the Eads bridge. The same company that published this report he reads from, repudiating that report, came forward and accepted the other plan, and have been consolidated with the other company by an act of the Senate not more than five days old. Was not the Senator advised of that when he read from that report, a partial report? for if he will read the whole of it he will find that they had not the Eads plan before them at all.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The gentleman will permit me to state that I read from the report of twenty-five distinguished civil engineers. In whose interest they made the report, I do not know, and I do not care.

Mr. MORTON. They made the report simply on the plan submitted by Boomer, and the same Boomer Company, abandoning that plan, has been consolidated by Congress with the other company, and now a new bridge is being built with one span of five hundred feet, and the other two spans of four hundred and ninety-seven feet. The Senator reads from this old repudiated report.

Now, Mr. President, there is no opposition to this measure, I believe, except on the part of two railroad companies who want the privilege of building two cheap bridges at the expense of the navigation of the Ohio river. They are willing to imperil navigation for all time to come, and make it costly for the sake of building cheap bridges, and to save those railroad companies a little expense. Why, sir, it should make no difference if the expense was twice, thrice, or four times what it is. What is the increased expense of building a long-span bridge compared with the interests of commerce on that great river, second only to the Mississippi; that commerce estimated by the Treasury Department at over four hundred millions annually; a trade almost equal to our entire commerce with all the world beside? And yet that is to be imperiled for the purpose of enabling a couple of railroad companies to build cheap bridges. They, no doubt, expect these bridges to be pulled down, and then that we shall rebuild them with long spans, as we are now doing at Rock Island, where the Government is pulling down one bridge for the purpose of building another.

I have no time to go over the evidence in this case. I submitted to the Senate some weeks ago the testimony of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati; I submitted the testimony of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburg; I submitted the testimony of some sixty Ohio river pilots with an average service of over twenty years; I submitted the testimony of some four hundred merchants in the city of Cincinnati and of some five hundred merchants in Pittsburg, comprising nearly all the business men of that city; I submitted the testimony of some two or three hundred steamboat captains and steamboat owners and men engaged in the manufacture of salt and sending it down the river, and men engaged in shipping coal; I submitted all testimony; I cannot read it over again. The entire business population of the Ohio river valley is on one side of this question, and stands against the interest of a couple of railroad companies who want the privilege of building cheap bridges.

The Senator wants his two bridges, the one at Parkersburg and the other at Bellair. Here is this bridge at Steubenville. It was built at first as an experiment. Time has shown, since it was built, within the last three years, that it is a nuisance and an obstruction to navigation. It has already cost more to the interests of navigation than the bridge itself cost. Then, if you get two bridges of the same kind that will be double the obstruction; three bridges will be three times the obstruction, each one going on until finally the navigation of the river is destroyed. I submitted the testimony of forty-two insurance companies of Cincinnati and below there, showing that the building of these bridges would increase the rates of insurance. I submitted the testimony of the chief of the Board of Underwriters at Pittsburg, representing all the insurance companies of that city, saying they must increase the rates of insurance on account of the existence of these bridges. And yet, in the face of all this overwhelming testimony, we are asked, for the sake of enabling two railroad companies to build cheap bridges, that they shall be allowed to go on and put up these bridges and obstruct the navigation.

But the Senator from West Virginia says he asked Colonel Roberts whether these tows, coal boats and salt barges, could not adjust themselves to the bridges. Why, of course they could. They could build the steamboats half the size. They could employ canoes, and adjust themselves in that way to all matters of that sort.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I asked if the existing boats could not be adapted to the bridge, and I have a letter here showing that it could be done very easily.

Mr. MORTON. I will not reread what I have read to the Senate once before. I have here a number of affidavits from those engaged in the coal business at Pittsburg, showing the width of tows that are employed there. These tows are on an average from one hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and fifty feet. Here is the testimony of T. & J. Watson, a coal firm of Pittsburg. They say in reply to an inquiry as to the regular width of the steamer Ajax:

"Length of tow, six hundred feet; width two hundred and fifty feet; contents, three hundred and thirty-six thousand bushels of coal, equal to thirteen thousand four hundred and forty tons."

Or that which would take thirteen hundred and forty-four railroad cars. I have other evidence here showing that the transportation of coal from Pittsburg to Cincinnati by the Ohio river is a cent and a half per bushel, and by railroad twenty-one cents and a quarter. Let me refer to that to show how much difference there is in value in preserving this channel of trade without injury:

"Two hundred thousand bushels of coal by river cost $3,000; by rail $42,500."

And so in regard to the salt and the iron. The navigation of the Ohio river is increasing from year to year as the country develops. The navigation of the Upper Mississippi is a mere bagatelle compared with it now. The lower Mississippi with all its tributaries has greater navigation, because that of the Ohio is a part of it, and this vast trade, which is equal to the trade perhaps of all European rivers that are navigable, is to be imperiled and obstructed by narrow bridges.

Now, Mr. President, instead of reading from the repudiated report of the Boomer Company, who have come up to the five hundred feet span, and are now a part of the corporation building it, I will read from the report made by Colonel Roberts, the officer now in charge of the Ohio river removing obstructions. You have appropriated in years past $8,000,000 to remove obstructions in the Ohio river, and now we are asked to allow other obstructions to be put in it. What does this officer say? This report is just made. He understands this question. Here is what his conclusion is, and there is not a more distinguished man in the engineer corps than Colonel Roberts. He says:

"My convictions on this important subject are based on a thorough acquaintance with it. I have no interest whatever but the public interest to subserve, and I do most emphatically give it as my opinion that Congress will do a lasting benefit to the American people by now establishing the limit of space between piers over the main channel of the Ohio river at not less than five hundred feet."

And that is the conclusion of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, a conclusion that is forced by the evidence, for I submit that no man can read this testimony and not agree to that conclusion. What do the committee say? They sum up in this way:

"The committee conclude from the information before them—

"1. That five hundred feet clear span across the channel-way will accommodate existing navigation on the Ohio, and that less than five hundred feet clear span will not.

"2. That such spans are practicable, and can be built at a less cost than bridges already constructed in this country and across the Ohio river."

The science of bridge building has grown in the last few years. Bridges are now built from year to year that were regarded as impossibilities some few years ago. Those who say that a five hundred feet span cannot be made practicable are made old fogies in the bridge building business. Here is the report of General Warren, in charge of the Mississippi river, who has been making surveys for bridges and for improvements around the rapids, an officer standing almost at the head of the engineer department in the employ of the Government.

What does he say about it? I will read a very brief extract from what he says. He sums up in this way:

"My investigation satisfies me that railroad bridges spans can be built of five hundred or even six hundred feet in length, without resorting to the suspension plan, against which, however, I think only unreasonable objections exist."

He says that they can be built of five or six hundred feet without resorting to the suspension plan, and he says the objection to that plan is unreasonable. Again, he says:

"In the last few years a great increase in our knowledge and means of building piers and long spans enables us to build them now with a much longer span and less expense than those built before."

Now, I call the attention of the Senate to the question of cost. General Warren here goes on to give an estimate of the cost of a bridge across the Ohio river at Steubenville with a span of five hundred feet which will cost $400,000 less than the Steubenville bridge actually did cost. I assert that the best evidence is to the effect that long-span bridges of five and six hundred feet can be built at the same cost, or at a less cost than bridges with the three hundred feet span. You save one pier in the river, and that is a very expensive thing; and then the suspension plan is cheaper than the truss bridge or any other bridge. The Senator says there is no example of this kind. Why, sir, there is the bridge at Cincinnati of ten hundred and fifty-eight feet span which it is estimated can carry fifteen thousand tons.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Is the Senator able to state whether that is a railroad bridge?

Mr. MORTON. It is able, I understand, to hold upon it at one time three hundred locomotives, if they could be piled on. It is not a railroad bridge; but the bridge at Niagara is, with a span of eight hundred and seventy-eight feet. That bridge has been in operation thirteen years, and it is said to be now the strongest and best bridge in the United States. Here is the testimony showing that suspension bridges can be built cheaper than any other form of bridge, and there is no doubt of it. Here is the opinion of General Warren, standing at the head of your engineer department, just rendered before a committee of the Senate, that you can build bridges with a span of five or six hundred feet perfectly safe, without resorting to suspension bridges at all, by a combination of the arch and the truss. There is no doubt upon the question of practicability. There is no engineering difficulty in the way.

So far as the cost is concerned, I will say to my friend from West Virginia that the best evidence is that they can build a bridge of five hundred feet span cheaper than they can build the little bridge he is proposing to build at Parkersburg. But let me say again, the question of cost can scarcely be mentioned in this connection.

Let me give the Senate for one moment, especially those who are not familiar with Cincinnati, some idea of the commerce of that city. The number of steamboats running from the city of Cincinnati, doing business between that point and other points, is three hundred and sixty-six; actual tonnage in tons, one hundred and fifty-six thousand eight hundred and thirty-two. The number of what they call model barges, not including coal barges at all, not including flat-boats, is ninety-one. The actual tonnage in tons of the barges is twenty-six thousand five hundred and forty; total in tons one hundred and eighty-three thousand three hundred and seventy-two. The average number of trips annually is eighteen, the total tonnage in tons annually is three million three hundred thousand six hundred and ninety-six. That is the commerce of the city of Cincinnati, a city now with not less than two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, and with an immense commerce that the world scarcely knows anything about. I have not got the data here in regard to Pittsburg; but Pittsburg has as many steamers, and she has an infinitely larger number of barges. Let me make a statement now in regard to one item, and I will make it from Colonel Roberts's report. I call the attention of the Senate to what Colonel Roberts, the engineer, says in regard to the business of the Ohio on one point. I refer to the question of coal:

"The quantity shipped from Pittsburg alone now exceeds forty million bushels."

Then from Pomeroy and the towns below there are certainly forty million more; making eighty million bushels of coal, an article of prime necessity. Of the single item of coal, eighty million bushels come from the upper end of that river, supplying all the towns and country down to the city of New Orleans, a distance, I believe, of some twenty-two or twenty-three hundred miles. Then there are three million bushels of salt. They start from Pomeroy and in that neighborhood. Besides all that, there is the great commerce of the Ohio, estimated at $400,000,000 annually; and yet this is to be obstructed and to be diminished for the sake of allowing two railroad companies to build cheap bridges below Wheeling, at Bellair, and at Parkersburg. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything more. The evidence, except of those interested in the construction of these two roads, is entirely on one side.

My friend from West Virginia thinks these immense tows can pass through the short span bridges. They have to wait and pass in the day time. The delays are great and costly. I have the affidavit of one coal dealer of Pittsburg who says that the delays at the Steubenville bridge simply, without reference to the boats that have been destroyed, in one year cost him $8,000; and the same rule applied to other dealers would make the cost of delays in one year from Pittsburg and Pomeroy and along there about three hundred thousand dollars. Now, sir, what does Colonel Roberts say in regard to the Steubenville bridge? He says:

"An ordinary tow of twelve barges, with six in front, has a frontage of one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty feet, and a length, including steamer, of four hundred to four hundred and fifty feet. The piers of the Steubenville bridge are three hundred feet apart. In daylight, with an experienced pilot who understands the river at that particular point, in its different stages, it can be safely passed. When it is passed, however, telegrams are sent back announcing the fact, because it is a constant source of anxiety to the coal merchants of Pittsburg."

Why, sir, when a tow passes the bridge it is telegraphed back to Pittsburg that the tow is below the bridge, that being an assurance of safety to the owner of the tow. It is a great thing to pass that bridge in safety, and, as Colonel Roberts says, they send dispatches back to the owners notifying them that they have passed the point of danger.

One word more. My friend says that the channel of the Ohio is only one hundred and fifty or two hundred and fifty feet wide. I am sorry that my friend's statements are in direct conflict with the report of the engineers. It may be that at low water, when these boats are not running at all, the channel may be said to be only one hundred and fifty or two hundred and fifty feet wide; but at certain stages of the water that last about six or seven months in the year, there is a clear waterway the whole way down of about eleven hundred feet. At that stage of water when these boats float, there is a clear waterway from Pittsburg down to the falls of the Ohio river of about eleven hundred feet. Why, sir, the very tow that I refer to is two hundred and fifty feet wide, and would never get through a channel such as the Senator from West Virginia has described.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Did the Senator say there was a fall of eleven hundred feet?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir. I say that according to Colonel Roberts and General Warren there is a clear waterway of eleven hundred feet all the way.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Whereabouts is the eleven hundred feet?

Mr. MORTON. The whole way as a general thing. The deepest part may be only one hundred and fifty or two hundred and fifty feet wide. It is when the water rises and covers the surrounding bars that we have a clear waterway of eleven hundred to twelve hundred feet. That is the testimony, and that is the way we get these enormous tows down. They do not navigate the river as they used to do a few years ago. It is not by flatboats, but it is done by placing these great coal boats and salt boats together, and then putting a stern-wheel steamer behind them.

Now, sir, the whole country is interested in this subject. It is a matter of vast interest not only to those living in the valley of the Ohio, but to the whole nation. The Ohio river is not local; it is not sectional. It belongs to the commerce of the nation; I might say to the commerce of the world, because they have built ships of war at Pittsburg which floated down that river to the Gulf of Mexico, and went upon the ocean. The navigation of that river is national. Its value is beyond computation, increasing every year; and whatever may be the cost of building these bridges, if they should cost four times or ten times as much that is a mere bagatelle compared with the value of the navigation of that stream.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to do, but the interests involved are very great.

Mr. POMEROY. I feel no more particularly interested in this question than any other Senator. I have not enough interest to be very earnest or very eloquent on the question of building a bridge or bridges on the Ohio river. But I have paid this subject some attention. I did not know that the committee had reported this bill until this morning. I wish the Senate would understand distinctly what the bill is. This is not a bill proposing to give any one company the right to bridge the river at any particular place, but it is a bill providing that for all time, if it becomes a law, and for every place, there shall be a bridge, defining the span in the main currents to be not less than five hundred feet and the approaches to that main current not less than two hundred and fifty feet. Now, I have to say this distinctly, that if there is any one company or any place that comes to Congress and asks to build such a bridge as that of course I would agree to it; but to make it compulsory, to oblige every company in every place up and down the river, where the river itself is not as wide as that, to make a span of five hundred feet, is ridiculous, not to say wicked.

In the first place, you are requiring a span of which there is not one in the United States to-day, because this is not contemplating suspension bridges. There is not a truss or arch railroad bridge in the United States with a span of five hundred feet, nor in any other country. You are requiring these people to enter upon an experiment that has never been tried. I know the other day we authorized a company at St. Louis, who asked it, to build a bridge there, a combination of the arch and the truss, where the span should be five hundred feet and to be ninety feet above low water. That is an experiment. I shall be glad to see it tried, although I said then that I had no faith in it. I have not now. The Senator says that according to the estimate made here such a bridge as that would only cost about seven hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars, and yet I notice that the engineer in his letter calling for a report from Mr. Eads makes the following remarks:

"A letter from Mr. James B. Eads, civil engineer, of St. Louis, dated April 7, 1888, concerning the bridge of five hundred feet span which he proposes to build at that place. He states that no published official report of this bridge has yet been made, but that he has one in course of preparation, which will be an elaborate one, for the use of the company, who expect to ask our (St. Louis) citizens to make a loan of the city's credit to the extent of $4,000,000."

The builder of this cheap bridge of five hundred feet span says he expects to ask the citizens of St. Louis to aid in its construction to the extent of $4,000,000! That does not look very much like a cheap structure, or a bridge coming within the ordinary expenses of any company.

I have no information not known to every Senator in regard to the Ohio river. I only say that where a bridge of this character is demanded let it be built; but the bill is so drawn that each case must be reported to the Secretary of War on its own merits, and if, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, a bridge of three hundred feet, or three hundred and fifty feet, as I propose to amend it, in any given case is not practicable, then he may order a board of engineers to examine and report, and he may increase the span upon the report and recommendation of the board of engineers to any extent he has a mind to do. The Secretary may order the span to be a thousand feet under this bill.

This bill proposes to begin at the maximum. As it now stands, it proposes that one span shall be five hundred feet at any rate, not allowing any discretion, because there is no need of any discretion, if you require five hundred feet on the start. That is the maximum. We begin where we should leave off. The bill should require, what has been required in other places, a span of three hundred and fifty feet; and then if the interests represented want the bridge, or think it should be more than three hundred and fifty feet, let a board of civil engineers report upon it; let the Secretary of War then order that it shall be made, as he can do under this bill; but to begin at five hundred feet is ruinous. No bridges will be built upon that plan. Why should Congress at this time undertake an experiment that has never been made a success in this or any other country?

I do not wish to interfere with the navigation of the Ohio river. They run these barges, I understand, two months in the year. About one sixth of the whole time they are able to run the barges in connection with steamboats. Now, shall the expense of bridges be placed beyond the reach of railroad corporations for an interest that occupies the river but two months in the year? But, sir, the fact is that the great commerce of the Ohio river is not confined to barges. That is the coal trade; but the great commerce that goes in steamboats does not need any five hundred feet span to get through.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator to allow me to correct him on one point. He says this coal navigation only takes place about two months in the year. I hold an affidavit in my hand showing the depth of the water and the character of the navigation for every day for three years; and this coal navigation lasts on an average about seven months.

Mr. POMEROY. I take the statement from Representatives from Ohio, and a Governor from Ohio, whose statement I have on the subject, and other citizens of Ohio.

Mr. MORTON. You take the statement of an attorney who was once Governor, but who comes here as an attorney for a railroad company—a very excellent gentleman; but he has made no affidavit about it.

Mr. POMEROY. I remember a statement in the House of Representatives some years ago that the Ohio river was a ditch, which is dry except for two months of the year, and frozen during the wet months, and I believe it has never been contradicted.

Mr. DAVIS. "Dry for half the year and frozen the other half."

Mr. POMEROY. That was it. Now, I submit to the Senate that this is an experiment. We ought not to require every company that may propose to bridge the Ohio river to put in a five hundred feet span when the experiment has never been tried, and never been made a success. Now, what I propose is that we shall require in this bill what we have required in other places, that the bridge shall have a span of three hundred and fifty feet, with authority to the Secretary of War to increase it to any extent if they can make out a case that demands it. That I think is reasonable and fair; but to require arbitrarily that in every place the span must be five hundred feet is equivalent to saying that bridges shall not be built on the Ohio river.

I only desire to say further, that the mania that seems to have taken possession of the public mind about these immense spans ought not to be yielded to until some successful experiment has been made. I know that there is one railroad suspension bridge in this country with a span of eight hundred feet; but with what care do they go over that at Niagara? If the trains are long they detach them. They run a little pony engine over, and go as carefully as a cat goes across a velvet carpet, showing that such bridges are not adapted to railroad purposes.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the special order. It is very evident that this bill cannot pass without a long discussion, and the time granted, an hour has passed, and more.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no disposition to urge the passage of the bill at this time. I am willing to yield, of course.

Mr. CONNESS. I supposed not; I was rather addressing myself to the honorable Senator from Indiana. I rather thought from the Senator's speech that he was opposed to the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no disposition to delay its passage either.

Mr. CONNESS. This bill can be taken up after we have passed the other bill, and I therefore call for the special order.

Mr. POMEROY. I have a few amendments I desire to offer, and if they are adopted I shall then urge the passage of this bill.

Mr. MORTON. I recognize the right of the bill referred to by the Senator from California, but I should be very glad to get a vote on this bill. It is very important to get a vote upon it to-day in order that it may go to the House of Representatives. I do not think it will take much longer. The Senator from Kansas says he has no objection, after speaking about half an hour against it. I do not know how much time he intends to occupy.

Mr. POMEROY. I have a few amendments to suggest, and if I can get the Senate to adopt those amendments I shall urge the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. If the bill could be passed in any reasonable time I would give way; but it is evident that it will occupy the whole day. For three days past the bill which is the special order has gone over, giving way to others. The bill before us may be an important bill in some respects, but it bears no comparison in that regard with the bill which has been delayed, and I hope we shall now go on with it.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish the Senator from California would forbear for a few minutes longer.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I feel bound to say that I have amendments to offer, and also two other gentlemen near me, in addition to the Senator from Kansas, and we cannot consent to let it go through in this way.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall desire to say a few words after the Senator from Kansas is through.

Mr. POMEROY. I will yield to the Senator at any time. If he desires to address the Senate he can do it now.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not, until you are through. I intend to reply to the Senator; and if the Senator from California will allow me a little time, I shall be glad to do so; but I prefer waiting until the Senator from Kansas is through.

Mr. POMEROY. The control of this matter is in the hands of the Senator from California. If he desires to call up the special order I will yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order was passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORTON. We can get a vote on this bill in a very short time I think, and perhaps the special order can be postponed long enough to take a vote.

Mr. CONNESS. As I said before, if there was any chance or any prospect of getting to a vote of course I would consent. I know the condition in which the Senator from Indiana is, and his relations to this bill, and I should like to accommodate him; but if Senators intend to discuss it at length, I cannot consent, of course, to that. Within any reasonable time within which this bill could be passed I would be willing to give way.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe I have never been guilty of discussing anything at great length.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not impute anything of that kind to the Senator.

Mr. POMEROY. I only want to explain certain amendments that I desire to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator insist on the special order?

Mr. CONNESS. I give way at present.

Mr. YATES. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me I should like to speak a few minutes on this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the special order. It is evident that this bill cannot be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California insists on the special order being taken up, and that bill is before the Senate.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States. The bill, as passed by the House of Representatives, is as follows:

Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, for the protection of which the Government of the United States was established; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations and vested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign States, owing allegiance to the Governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign States, shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign; or if any citizen shall have been arrested and detained whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to suspend in part, or wholly, commercial relations with the said Government, or in case no other remedy is available, to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, except ambassadors and other public ministers and their domestics and domestic servants, and the President shall, without delay, give information to Congress of any proceedings under this act.

The Committee on Foreign Relations reported an amendment to the bill and an amendment to the preamble. The amendment to the bill was in section three, after the word "refused," in line ten, to strike out the following words:

The President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to suspend in part, or wholly, commercial relations with the said Government, or in case no other remedy is available, to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, except ambassadors and other public ministers and their domestics and domestic servants, and the President shall, without delay, give information to Congress of any proceedings under this act.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

It shall be the duty of the President forthwith to report to Congress all the circumstances of any such arrest and detention, and any proceedings for the release of the citizen so arrested and detained, that Congress may take prompt action to secure to every citizen of the United States his just rights.

MR. CONNESS. I believe it is first in order to perfect the original text before the question is taken on striking it out.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course it is.

MR. DRAKE. That is a very good rule where the intention is to strike out the whole bill and move a substitute; but I suggest to the honorable Senator from California that the rule as he states it now does not cover the particular case that is now in hand.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the ordinary case of an amendment to an amendment, such as any one can offer.

MR. SUMNER. I submit that the first question will be on the amendments of the committee, and after that the bill will be open to further amendment.

MR. CONNESS. We have a right first to amend by striking out those, if we choose. The amendment of the committee to the third section is a material amendment; it is a substantial amendment.

MR. SUMNER. I have not had the privilege of explaining that amendment. I rose, but did not succeed in obtaining the floor.

MR. CONNESS. If the Senator desires to address himself to the amendment, I will yield the floor to him with pleasure?

MR. SUMNER. I do.

MR. CONNESS. Very well.

MR. SUMNER. Before entering upon this discussion, I wish to read a brief telegram, which came by the cable last evening, as follows:

"LONDON, July 17.—In the House last evening, Stanley, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, made an important statement in answer to a question asking for information. In reply he said he had already sent to the United States Government a note on the matter of naturalization, the substance of which was that the British ministry was ready to accept the American views of the question. He therefore thought a misunderstanding between the two nations impossible."

Add to this important information the well-known fact that the United States have already ratified treaties with North Germany and Bavaria, and that we are engaged in negotiating treaties with other Powers for the settlement of this very question; and we may surely approach this discussion without any anxiety, except for the honor of our country.

Permit me to say, at the outset, that the declared object of the present bill is all lost in certain special features, which are nothing less than monstrous, and utterly unworthy of a generous Republic, hoping to give an example to mankind. Surely, sir, it is noble to reach out and protect the rights of the citizen at home and abroad, but no zeal in this behalf should betray us into conduct which cannot be regarded without a blush.

This bill proposes to give prodigious powers to the President, such as have never been lavished before in our history. They are without precedent. On this account alone, they should be considered carefully; and they should not be granted unless on good reason. If it be shown that they are not only without precedent, but that they are inconsistent with the requirements of modern civilization; that they are of evil example; and that they tend directly to war, then, on this account, we should hesitate still more before we venture to grant them. Not lightly can a nation set itself against the requirements of civilization; not lightly can a nation do an act of evil example; not lightly can a nation take any steps toward war. The whole business is solemn. Nothing graver could challenge the attention of the Senate.

Two powers are conferred upon the President; first, to suspend commercial relations with a foreign Government, and secondly, to arrest and to detain in custody any subject of a foreign Government found within the jurisdiction of the United States. The suspension of commercial relations and the arrest of innocent foreigners, simply at the will of the President—these are the two powers. It would be difficult to imagine greater.

We have had in our own history the instance of an embargo, when all our merchant ships were kept at home and forbidden to embark in foreign commerce. That measure was intended to save our ships from insult and our sailors from impressment. This was done by act of Congress. I am not aware of any instance, in our own history or in the history of any other country, where there has been a suspension of commercial relations with any foreign Power, unless as an act of war. The moment war is declared there is, from the fact of war, a suspension of commercial relations with the hostile Power. Commerce with that Power is impossible, and there can be no contract even between the citizens or subjects of the two Powers. But this is war. It is now proposed to do this something and to call it peace. The proposition is new, absolutely new. Not an instance of history, not a phrase in the law of nations sanctions it. I need not say how little congenial it is with the age in which we live. The present object of good men is to make war difficult, if not impossible. Here is a way to make war easy. To the President is given this alarming power. In Europe war proceeds from the sovereign; in England from the queen in council; in France from Louis Napoleon. This is according to the genius of monarchies. By the Constitution of our Republic it is Congress alone that can declare war. And yet by this bill One Man, in his discretion, may do little short of declaring war. He may hurl one of the bolts of war, and sever the commercial relations of two great Powers. Consider well what must ensue. Suppose the bolt is hurled at England. All that various commerce on which so much depends; all that interchange of goods which contributes so infinitely to the wants of each; all that shipping, and all those steamers traversing the ocean between the two; all the multitudinous threads of business by which the two peoples are woven together, warp and woof, as in a mighty loom—all these must be severed.

The next power conferred on the President is like unto the first in its abnormal character. It is nothing less than authority, in his discretion, to make reprisals by seizing innocent foreigners happening to be in the United States. The more this is considered the more it must be regarded with distrust.

Reprisals belong to the incidents of war in the earlier ages, before civilization had tempered the rudeness of mankind. All reprisals are of doubtful character. Reprisals on persons are barbarous. I do not say that according to the received rights of war some terrible occasion may not arise even for this barbarous agency; but I insist that it is frowned upon by all the best authorities even in our own country; that it is contrary to enlightened reason, and that it is utterly without any recent example. Admitting that such reprisals are not entirely discarded by the writers on the law of nations, they are nevertheless condemned. By the rights of war, as once declared, the lives of prisoners taken on the field of battle were forfeit. Early history attests the frequency of this bloody sacrifice. Who now would order the execution of prisoners of war? The day has passed when any such outrage can be tolerated. But it is hardly less barbarous to seize innocent persons whom business or pleasure has brought within your peaceful jurisdiction, under the guarantee of the Public Faith.

I am unwilling to occupy time on a matter which is so clear in the light of modern civilization, and of that enlightened reason which is the handmaid to civilization. And yet the present effort will justify me in exposing the true character of reprisals as seen in the light of history.

Reprisals were recognized by the Greeks but disowned by the Romans. According to Bynkershoeck, who is so much quoted on the Law of Nations, "there is no instance of such wickedness in the history of that magnanimous people; nor do their laws exhibit the least trace of it." (Bynkershoeck, Questiones Juris Pub., chap. 24.) This is strong language, and is in itself a condemnation of this whole agency. It is of the more weight, as the author is our austere authority on questions of the Law of Nations giving to the right of war the strongest statement. According to him reprisals are nothing less than "wickedness," unworthy of a magnanimous people. During the middle ages and afterwards, reprisals were in vogue; but they have never found favor. They have been constantly reprobated. Even when formally sanctioned, they have been practically excluded by safeguards and conditions. In a treaty between Cromwell and the States General, there was a stipulation against reprisals, "unless the prince, whose subject shall conceive himself to have been injured, shall first lay his complaint before the sovereign, whose subject is supposed to have committed the tortuous act, and unless that sovereign shall not cause justice to be rendered to him within three months after his application." (Bynkershoeck, Ibid.) This stipulation was renewed under Charles II. The same principle was declared by the grand pensionary, De Witt, who, in the name of Holland, protested, that, "reprisals cannot be granted, except in case of an open denial of justice, and that, even in case of a denial of justice, the sovereign cannot empower his subjects to make reprisals, until he has repeatedly demanded justice for them." (Halleck, International Law, p. 310.) A similar rule was also declared in the famous letter to the King of Prussia, in the case of the Silesian loan, written by Murray, afterward Lord Mansfield, and so much praised by Montesquieu. Here it is said: "The Law of Nations, founded upon justice, equity, convenience, and the reason of the thing, and confirmed by long usage, does not allow of reprisals, except in case of a violent injury, direct and supported by the State, and justice absolutely denied in re minime dubia by all tribunals and afterward by the prince. (Duponceau's Bynkershoek, p. 188, note.) This is clear and strong. I might quote authorities without end to the same point. I content myself with adding the words of General Halleck, who, after saying in his admirable manual that "reprisals bring us to the awful confines of actual war," proceeds to lay down the rule that reprisals, even on property, can be only "where justice has been plainly denied or unreasonably delayed." (Halleck, p. 29.) This rule commends itself as reasonable and just.

In the early days reprisals were directed against persons as well as property. Even against property it was done with hesitation, only in cases free from all doubt and after ample appeal to the sovereign for justice. Against persons it was done very rarely. Grotius, our greatest master, who brought the rules of international law to the touchstone of reason, asserts that all reprisals are vindicated by custom rather than by nature. His language is that this rule "is not indeed authorized by nature but generally received by custom." (Grotius, book iii, chap. 2, §4.) Since then the tendency has been to a constant mitigation of the rule, even as regards property. Without burdening this discussion with cases, which are numerous, I give the summary of Wheaton in these words: "It appears to be the modern rule of international usage, that property of the enemy found within the territory of the belligerent State, or debts due to his subjects by the Government or individuals at the commencement of hostilities are not liable to be seized and confiscated as prize of war." (Wheaton's Elements, Lawrence's edit., p. 629.) This rule, which is applicable to the condition of things on the breaking out of war, attests the care with which the modern law of nations watches the rights of individuals, and how it avoids making them suffer. Thus even debts are not liable to seizure. How much more should an innocent person be exempt from any such outrage?

It is when we consider the modern rule with regard to persons, instead of property, that we are impressed still more by its benignity. Here I quote, first a British authority, and then an American. Mr. Phillimore, the author of the very elaborate and candid treatise on the law of nations, so full of various learning, after admitting that reprisals "strictly speaking, affect the persons as well as the goods," proceeds to say, that "in modern times they have been chiefly confined to goods;" and he then adds in words, worthy of consideration now, that, "it is to be hoped that the reprisal of persons has fallen with other unnecessary and unchristian severities into desuetude; and certainly, to seize travelers, by way of reprisals, is a breach of the tacit faith pledged to them by the State, when they were allowed to enter her borders." (Phillimore, Law of Nations, vol. III, chap. 2.) The same enlightened conclusion is expressed by Dana in his excellent notes to Wheaton, as follows: "The right of reprisals is not limited to property, but extends to persons, still the practice of modern times discountenances the arrest and detention of innocent persons strictly in the way of reprisals." (Dana; Wheaton, p. 370, note.) Thus do British and American publicists concur in homage to a common civilization.

If we look at the reason of the modern rule, which spares persons, we shall find it in two different considerations, each of controlling authority; first, that an innocent person cannot be seized in a foreign country without a violation of the Public Faith; and secondly, that no private individual can be justly held responsible for the act of his Government. On the first head Vattel speaks as follows: "The sovereign declaring war can neither detain those subjects of the enemy who were within his dominions at the time of the declaration, nor their effects. They came into this country on the Public Faith. By permitting them to enter his territory and continue there he has tacitly promised them liberty and perfect security for their return." (Vattel, book II, chap. 18, § 344; book III, chap. 4, § 63; chap. 5, § 73.) In the same sense Halleck says: "Travelers and passing guests are in general excepted from such liability." (Halleck, International Law, p. 302.) The other reason was assigned by Mr. Webster in his correspondence with the British Government in relation to the Caroline. The British Government having acknowledged the act of McLeod in burning this vessel as their act, Mr. Webster at once declared that, after this avowal, the individuals engaged in it could not be held personally responsible, and he added words worthy of memory at this juncture: "The President presumes that it can hardly be necessary to say that the American people, not distrustful of their ability to redress public wrongs by public means, cannot desire the punishment of individuals when the act complained of is declared to have been an act of the Government itself." (Phillimore, vol. III, p. 53.) Weighty words, by which our country is forever bound. The same principle is adopted by Halleck, in his text-book, when he says: "No individual is justly chargeable with the guilt of a personal crime for the act of the community of which he is a member." (Halleck, International Law, p. 296.) All these authorities furnish us the same lesson, and warn against the present proposition.

Another argument may be found in the extent to which reprisal on persons has been discarded by modern precedents. It is denounced, not only by authority, but also by practice. I have already said that the proposition to suspend commercial relations is without an example in history. The other proposition is without example since the hateful act of the first Napoleon, condemned afterward by himself, when at the breaking of the short-lived peace of Amiens, he seized innocent Englishmen who happened to be in France, and detained them as prisoners, precisely as is now proposed under the present bill. Among these Englishmen, who became the victims of this tyrannical decree, was Lord Elgin, on his return from Constantinople, where he had been ambassador; also the famous Sir Sidney Smith, the hero of Acre; both of whom at the time were passing through France. There was also an ingenious scholar, of feeble health, but exquisite attainments, Joseph Forsyth, author of one of the best books ever written on Italy. He, too, was seized. In the preface to his admirable work his family have recorded the outrage. Read it if you would know the judgment that awaits such a transaction. The English historian who has pictured the events of that time thus describes this decree:

"This declaration of war was immediately followed by an act as unnecessary as it was barbarous, and which contributed, more perhaps than any other circumstance, to produce that strong feeling of animosity against Napoleon which pervaded all classes of the English during the remainder of the contest. Two French vessels had been captured, under the English letters of marque, in the bay of Audierne, and the first consul made this a pretense for ordering the arrest of all the English then traveling in France between the ages of eighteen and sixty years. Under this savage decree, unprecedented in the annals of modern warfare, above ten thousand innocent individuals, who had repaired to France in pursuit of business, science, or amusement, on the faith of the law of nations, which never extended hostilities to persons in such circumstances, were at once thrown into prison from whence great numbers of them were never liberated until the invasion of the allies in 1814."—Alison, vol. II, p. 198.

Napoleon himself at a later day, when reason resumed its sway, condemned the act. In his conversations at St. Helena with Las Casas he said: "The greater part of these English were wealthy or noble persons, who were traveling for their amusement. The more novel the act, the more flagrant its injustice, the more it answered my purpose." (Ibid., note.) Here, then, was an admission that the act was at once novel and unjust. The generals that surrounded him at the time most reluctantly enforced it. From the memoirs of the Duchess D'Abrantes, we learn how poignantly her gallant husband, Junot, took it to heart and protested. He was unwilling to have anything to do with such an infamy. Recovering at last from the stupor caused by the order, he said: "You know not only my attentiveness to your person, but my absolute devotion to everything which concerns you. It is that devotion which induces me to hesitate at obeying your orders and imploring you to take a few hours to reflect on the measure which you have now commanded. Demand my life; demand my blood; I will surrender them without hesitation; but to ask a thing which must cover us with —, I am sure that when you come to yourself, and are no longer fascinated by those around you, who compel you to violent measures, you will be of my opinion." (Ibid., note.) Every word of this earnest expostulation may now be justly addressed to the Senate. You, too, should you yield to those who insist upon violent measures, will regret the surrender. You will grieve that your country has been permitted through you to fall from the great example which it owes to mankind. Sir, save your country; save yourselves.

Suppose the law is passed and the authority conferred upon the President. Who shall he seize? What innocent foreigner? It may be Mr. Dickens, or Mr. Trollope, or Rev. Newman Hall; or it may be some merchant here on business, guiltless of any wrong and under the constant protection of the Public Faith. The moment you do this you will cover the country with shame, of which the present bill will be the painful prelude. You will be guilty of a barbarism kindred to that of the Abyssinian king, Theodorus. You will degrade the national name, and make it a byword of reproach. Sir, now is the time to arrest this dishonor. See to it by your votes that it is impossible forever.

Mr. CONNESS. An amendment I believe is now in order to the body of the bill, and if so, I move first to perfect the third section. I have already submitted an amendment which has been printed; but I propose a modification of that amendment as follows: by striking out from the seventh, eighth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth lines the following words: in the seventh line, "or if any citizen shall have been arrested and;" in the eighth line by striking out the word "detained;" and inserting the word "and;" in the tenth and eleventh lines by striking out "to suspend in part, or wholly, commercial relations with the said Government, or in case no other remedy is available;" so that, if thus amended, the section will read:

That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested, and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purpose of this act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign, and whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I propose to say a few words.

Mr. SUMNER. I raise a question of order, as to whether the amendment is in order. The Senator can move to amend after the amendment of the committee; but, until that is disposed of, it seems to me that any other proposition in the way of amendment is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I propose this as an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator need not be in haste to get to a first vote upon the proposition that he has submitted. He has had an opportunity to present his views, and he has given us a learned dissertation on another subject than that involved in this bill, including some translation of Latin passages, for which we feel under obligation, as usual, for otherwise we should not have understood them!

Mr. President, the history of this bill in the Senate must be well understood by every Senator before me—the reluctance of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to report it to the Senate and allow us the high privilege of considering it, and the proposed action of the Senate to secure it before this body for its consideration; and, connected with this, the fortuitous and auspicious declaration of my Lord Stanley, received yesterday by the cable, which renders this bill entirely unnecessary. To which agency we should be most obliged, the graciousness of my Lord Stanley, or the utility of the cable, perhaps will be a matter of curious reflection. Probably both in this instance contributed, as stated in the opinion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who conducts, so far as the head of a committee on Foreign Relations of this body can conduct, our foreign affairs.

The honorable Senator in discussing the question of reprisals, which he finds in the bill, treats us to a dissertation on the question of reprisals pending war. This does not contemplate war; it does not propose to produce war; it is not intended to regulate the action of our nation or to affect other nations in case of war; but it does propose that there shall be American statute law for the protection of naturalized citizens who shall be found in foreign States, and who shall have been arrested and imprisoned and thus deprived of their rights and liberty. What does the bill propose? Its language is very plain. The first section provides that "any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government." I understand the honorable Senator and the committee to be in favor of that section. The second section provides "that all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign States, shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances." There is no objection to that. The third proposes that "whenever it shall be duly made known to the President," for it will be remembered that the Congress of the United States is not to be always in session, "that any citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act, upon the allegation" by the nation arresting him "that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign," then in that case certain steps are to be taken, particularly further where the release of such citizen so arrested and held shall upon demand have been unreasonably delayed or refused.

Now, Mr. President, what is the state of facts existing to-day? I suppose it is undeniable; the truth of it is not to be challenged or gainsayed, that there are many citizens of the United States in British prisons, having been arrested, tried, and convicted upon charges of having committed treason-felony, but whose trials have been conducted in that country, and whose convictions have been obtained upon testimony of words spoken or acts done by those persons within the jurisdiction of our own country.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator hold that to be contrary to American law?

Mr. CONNESS. I propose, Mr. President, to make American law that shall make that impossible.

Mr. SUMNER. There is nothing of the kind in this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Many persons, native-born American citizens, have also been arrested within the British jurisdiction in like manner as naturalized citizens, but up to this time I believe every such citizen has been discharged from confinement. I have in my possession affidavits showing that citizens of the United States have been convicted upon false testimony in British courts, and proving without any question that the parties alleged to have committed certain offenses were not at the place charged at the time alleged; but by the system of espionage and spies; by the system of suborning testimony so readily and easily, and so constantly followed in that country, those persons have been convicted, and are now immured in foreign dungeons. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposes that there shall be no law for their redemption, and he says there is no necessity for a law now, for Lord Stanley has said that the British Government are ready to accede to and accept the American views upon this subject, but they are not ready yet to make a treaty. Well, Mr. President, even if they were ready to order the discharge of all these citizens of ours from prison, we should not be prepared to accept it as an act of grace in lieu of a statute on the subject by us. We owe to these citizens the same measure of protection and the same measure of defense that we do any other citizens of the United States.

We are told by the Senator that to pass an act of this kind is a declaration of war. In what manner is it a declaration of war? I ask every Senator present, and I submit to the common sense of any man on this floor with his knowledge of British blood, whether the British nation would submit for a single instant that we should treat their subjects in like manner as they have treated our citizens. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has called our attention to the case of King Theodorus, and says that to pass this law would be imitating him. Why, sir, that case is a most special instance of the extent to which the British nation and people are prepared to go when outrages are committed against the liberties of their subjects. King Theodorus seizes half a dozen persons who have been interfering in his local affairs and places them in prison, deprive them of their liberty; and the British administration organize a formidable expedition and send it forth for the special purpose of redeeming those men and giving them that right to which they hold every British subject by nature entitled. They go there, at a cost of millions, with thousands of men, and they seize the capital and finally take the head of that nation and destroy him, and they return, received with welcome by the whole British nation; and then what follows to the commander of that expedition? The highest honors that are conferred by the British nation await him and they are immediately conferred on him. Why? Because he was the successful agent of the British Government in redeeming from unlawful detention and persecution, half a dozen British subjects.

Does this bill propose to seize any innocent British subject within our jurisdiction as Napoleon did? Why, sir, when Napoleon seized British subjects, as has been stated, it was when the nations were in a state of war. We are in a condition of peace; we are entitled to all the consideration from the Government of Great Britain that any other nation is; and yet in time of peace they seize our people and incarcerate them and punish them. What do we do? What are our processes? We propose inquiries on petition again and again and representation by these men and their friends; and our modes of inquiry are through the slow and tortuous processes of the State Department, the examination of testimony and trials, and finally representation and quiet protest. But now, Mr. President, let me say (no matter with what motive done) to the credit of the present head of the State Department that latterly a more vigorous protest has been made, a protest deserving of the nation; but it comes very late.

But when this case has been argued by the head of our State Department with foreign nations, he has been met in all instances by the fact that we had no declaration upon our own statute-books making law upon this subject. It was well stated by the honorable Senator while up, that the English authorities and our own corresponded in this regard. Why not? We derived our principles of law from them, and they did not recognize in any respect the right of expatriation. We are told that it is now being conceded by treaties made with some other Governments. Certainly, sir, it is so; but when and why has it been done? It is done because we are taking a rank that entitles us to respect among the nations; but except in the kingdom of Prussia none of our citizens have been arrested outside of Great Britain.

The honorable Senator seems to think, and he argues, that if we make this provision of law, that upon their seizing our people, restraining them of their liberties, we pointing out the illegal restraint, and asking for their dismissal from imprisonment, and still they are restrained, if we return and treat them with the same measure of justice or apply the same act to their people, that would be a cause of war. Well, Mr. President, if that should be a cause of war, in God's name what cause of war could be more holy? Where is there a man with American pride of character that would not instantly fly to the defense of the nation in the prosecution of a war for such a cause?

I do not, Mr. President, stand here as the advocate of men who have been admitted to our citizenship, and who go from our country to others with a purpose of stirring up revolt. If that can be shown in any case it justifies their detention, and we have nothing further to say. We defend our institutions against the interference of persons both at home and abroad; and as a matter of course we concede as widely that right to other nations. But, sir, it would be indeed most strange if we were not ready at this period of the world's history to stand up in defense of the great principle that a human being created in the image of his Maker and, as we say, the peer of any man, has the right to determine where his citizenship shall be, what country he shall give his allegiance to, what class of political institutions he shall accept and adopt. The monstrous plea which would deny that right at this age of the world is not to be listened to.

I know, sir, that this is an important question; I know that it involves delicate considerations. I would not for any consideration but that upon which the pride and dignity of this country rest and must rest do any act at any time to involve us in difficulties with any other nation; but if we refuse the measure of simple justice, the equal protection of all our citizens, we should then repeal our naturalization laws; we should stop inviting men to come and accept of their terms; and we should declare ourselves, as we would deserve to be, a people determined to have no intercourse with other peoples; determined not to extend our institutions nor allow others to participate in them. But, sir, while we invite them and while we offer them the means—the legal and ready means—of equal citizenship with us, we should stand ready to give them equal protection.

And, Mr. President, the performance of less than our duty in this case will not be justified by the public opinion of this country; and it is, after all, that public opinion based upon common sense, and based upon a sense of right, and with ability enough to know what is right, that governs this great land. The party that the majority of this Senate are representatives of have recently solemnly declared that the naturalized citizen is entitled to and shall receive the same measure of protection with the native citizen.

Mr. HOWARD. How have they declared it?

Mr. CONNESS. In their platform. I refer to the platform adopted by the recent Chicago convention. The Democratic party, too, going before the people of this country for their votes, have asserted the same proposition; and we stand before the people to-day asking their suffrages upon that basis; and we cannot, in sincerity or good faith, refuse the measure of protection necessary to secure the independence of the naturalized citizen. He must not be subject, when he goes abroad upon his own legitimate business, to being seized and kidnapped, or tried and thrown into prison without due cause.

Why, Mr. President, the statement found in connection with these cases should bring the blush of shame to every man's cheek who is an American. I have here the affidavit of the companion of Colonel Halpin, a man who won honor and credit in our service in the late war; the sworn statement of his companion. Going into the port of Queenstown within British jurisdiction, upon a French passenger ship, both of them were seized on the 4th day of July, and hurried off to prison. Even the certificate of naturalization that Colonel Halpin had in his trunk, and also his passport, were taken from him, and he never saw them from that day to this. The evidence of his citizenship; the evidence of his certified right to travel according to the rule and comity of nations, he was deprived of and hurried off to prison, and by, as I said before, suborned testimony he was convicted for words spoken and acts done within the United States, and sentenced to penal servitude for fifteen years. He still remains in that condition. What steps are to be taken? Are we to petition her most gracious majesty the queen for his release? Are we to ask Disraeli to cease for a moment his attempts to defeat the advance of British liberality that he may give his attention to our petitions for the release of this, our citizen, deprived of his liberty? Or are we to affirm his right, as we should, and accompany that affirmation with proper means to secure his release?

One objection is that it is conferring an extraordinary power upon the President of the United States. Who should exercise this power but the Executive? What arm should be extended, if any, but the Executive arm? Are we to be told that it is a power that the present Executive should not have conferred upon him? Why, sir, that is tantamount to the expression of opinion that those now in prison may remain there until we have a change of administration; Congress can take no act in the premises but make law and regulation. No step can be taken for their release but through an executive act.

Suppose, Mr. President, if we are to rely on the power of Congress to intervene by passing resolutions, by requesting the President of the United States, as we have in some instances in behalf of persons convicted of offenses within British jurisdiction, to ask the British Government to release them, are we to remain in inaction? If Congress be not in session, are our people to be arrested and held and confined, and no step to be taken? Are we to deny the theory of our own institutions? Is the President of the United States to be held to have sufficient power and authority to do every act within our own country necessary to carry on this great Government, but not to be invested with the power and authority to reach his hand forth to a citizen who is seized by a foreign Power and deprived of his liberty? Mr. President, I shall be much mistaken if the patriotism of this body, and if the common sense of the people outside of this Chamber, shall not demand that we have a law on this subject specifically reaching the case.

I am a little astonished that an American Senator should introduce here as a reason why we should not act a dispatch relative to the speech of a British minister who, in the same breath which states that the American views are adopted also states that they are not prepared to make a treaty while these men are in prison.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that I did not assign that as a reason why we should not act. I said in view of that we might approach this discussion without any undue anxiety.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator is worse than his speech. Without undue anxiety we can approach this subject, while our people are in prison, because the British minister speaks smooth words! The words that should be spoken should be words by the authority of this people, saying, "Let those who are held in violation of the principles of natural justice, in violation of our duties to protect them, be released." It is no offense that we make this demand. No nation has a right to complain of it. Those who arrest our people and hold them in custody are the offenders. It is not we who reach our arms forth for their protection who offend; we are but in the plain line and path of duty.

Does any man suppose that if the king of the Sandwich Islands should have arrested and imprisoned a dozen or a score of our people there would not have been a frigate sent to demand their release? But Great Britain can treat us with this indignity. It is a great Power. We trade with the British people to a large extent; commerce and capital are sensitive; and human beings can languish and rot lest they be disturbed!

Nor, Mr. President, in behalf of the release of these men is one act of war or approximating to war or justifying war necessary. The case is so plain, so palpable, and the duty equally so, that we have but to ask and we shall be heard and obeyed. But, Mr. President, what can we expect but disdain, refusal, neglect, contempt, in the face of the speech that has been made here to-day by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations? My Lord Stanley has said that they accept the American view and the cable has brought it to us. Halpin says, "I am for fifteen years at hard labor as a felon," a man who was yesterday a soldier of the Republic meeting its foes hand to hand and shoulder to shoulder; "I have done no act; I have committed no crime; I demand your intercession in my behalf and my release." The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of the Republic replies, "Lord Stanley says he accepts our view, but is not ready to make a treaty, and the case should create no anxiety!" That is the case stated, Mr. President. It cannot be evaded or avoided.

The honorable Senator's dissertation on international law, on the rights of belligerents in time of war, has no application to the case. When a single negro, male or female, is deprived of the high privilege of entering a common mode of conveyance on the public highways in the Republic, my honorable friend stands forth here as the exponent and defender of equal rights before the law, and I aid him. It is a big subject, Mr. President; for this nation has been agitated deeply and widely by its correlative questions. But when a foreign-born citizen, taking the responsibilities of citizenship, and bravely accepting them with all the horrors of war, takes also, as he believes, the rights of American citizenship, and is found in a foreign dungeon, there is no resolution proposed by the honorable Senator; there is no action of the Government urged by the honorable Senator; nay, he rises here and insists that it is not necessary to act, for my Lord Stanley has said, and the cable has brought it, that he accepts the American view!

Sometimes, Mr. President, I have thought that the men who entertain views might better entertain something else. They might better have blood and sympathies and courage, and let the views take care of themselves, as they would. A man starves, and the Senator does not offer him a stone, but some common air. A man is incarcerated and in a dungeon, and cries from thence and invokes a nation and a people whom he has served so well, and the Senator responds to him by offering views in a dissertation on international law that has no applicability to the case. Mr. President, this is not a period for stuff and fustian. It is not a period when stones are taken in exchange for bread, or rags for raiment, or excuses for acts.

There may be, Mr. President, within this Republic some citizens of foreign birth who do not perform their whole duties to it. It were a great wonder if it were not so, for it is covered all over with citizens of native birth of like character and acts. The measure of human frailties is too large and extensive to shield any portion of human nature from laches in such cases. But, Mr. President, it cannot be denied that from the source of foreign immigration, that from the European nations and peoples, this Republic has drawn and drawn largely to contribute to its life, its vigor, and its power. It draws yet from the source and with the same results each year, each day, and each hour. It comes to invigorate, to supply, to maintain, and to defend when necessary; and all the boon it asks is the performance according to the rules of common sense and justice of our obligations that we have voluntarily tendered and made to them. Nor should it be forgotten that people who thus come here and make their homes among us forever are often found among our very best Americans. Those of them whom God has blessed with intellect, and there are many, understand well what American republicanism is worth; they know its value, they know what a prize they receive, and their zeal in every good work is constantly felt. But, Mr. President, this picture is not necessary to describe our duty, for we owe to the merest beggar in the land, who is one of our people, the same measure of protection that you are entitled to, sir, from your high place. It is upon that eternal principle of right and humanity that the institutions of this Republic are based broad and wide and indestructible.

I do not speak, Mr. President, for votes; let no man say so. From the first hour of my arrival in the Republic I was one of its devoted people. I have no respect for any person of foreign birth who comes among us and asks and accepts our citizenship and who does not devote himself fully and entirely to the Republic. I believe in political consecration to the great work that this nation has in hand. And now, Mr. President, when in the light of the great example that this nation has set in that greatest measure of human progress, the separation of church from State, a neighboring nation grasps up the cause, seizes the cause that we have illustrated and proved and is carrying it forward to certainty of success, let us on our part not be lacking in the demonstration that in other respects, too, our system of Government is equal to every duty.

Now, Mr. President, I ask in the name of common sense what have we done for the release of those persons who speak to us from foreign dungeons. We have written letters; we have communicated with ambassadors; we have sat in conclaves and committees; and except the release of some of our citizens by reason of the operation of the treaty recently confirmed here with the kingdom of Prussia, no act but one of disgrace to us has transpired.

Let it not be said, Mr. President, that on this subject I have any deeper feeling than I have in behalf of every other human being restricted of his or her rights. My life, such as it is, has been an illustration of my belief in the principle and in its universal application. But I do ask the law-making power to make its utterance, and make it a rule for the Executive so that these complaints shall not be made and still unheard. Let us not depend upon the grace of foreign rulers; but let us depend upon the independent, fearless, and righteous acts of our own Government.

I know, Mr. President, that I have detained the Senate very long, indeed; much longer than I had intended. I came to the subject to submit the remarks I have made without preparation. I did not intend to do my little part in this matter by the production of essays. I have never sought to make reputation in that way. Every trade has its ways and its tricks. To weave words is not one of mine; but I can understand, sir, and so can you, when one of our people is deprived of every right that makes life endurable while the power that should protect him in them all neglects him and turns away from him. I implore and beg that this shall no longer be our rule; that we shall act in avoidance no longer; but that we shall do and perform our plain, simple duty, and let the rest take care of itself.

Mr. HOWARD obtained the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator commences, the Chair would like to present some communications which are on his table.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to read it, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Experience has fully demonstrated the wisdom of the framers of the Federal Constitution. Under all circumstances the result of their labors was as near an approximation to perfection as was compatible with the fallibility of man. Such being the estimation in which the Constitution is and has ever been held by our countrymen, it is not surprising that any proposition for its alteration or amendment should be received with reluctance and distrust.

Several SENATORS. What is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A message of the President of the United States suggesting certain changes in the Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DRAKE. That is a message proposing four amendments to the Constitution of the United States. I have examined it at the Clerk's desk. Of course the only proper disposition of it is either to lay it on the table or refer it to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SUMNER. And let it be ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it ought to be read; it is a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not usual to read messages from the President of the United States sent to us in ordinary form. If he sends a veto message, something on which we are to vote and act, it is a different thing; but this merely initiates a proceeding, and properly goes to a committee for consideration. There is no necessity for reading it.

Mr. DRAKE. None whatever.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document will be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary if there be no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then let us take the vote.

Mr. POMEROY. My motion is that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that the Senator from Michigan yielded the floor to allow the Chair to lay a message before the Senate, and therefore the Senator has not the floor until that is disposed of.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I have yielded the floor for nothing. I have but a few words to say. I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair claims the right to lay messages before the Senate when a favorable opportunity offers. He always tries to do it in such a way as to disturb the business of the Senate as little as possible. The rules give the Chair a right to place messages before the body in preference to anything else.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly; but the question is whether I have lost the floor by the presentation of the paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When this business is disposed of, the Senator will have the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the Senator from Maine to insist that I had lost it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all. I said the Senator had yielded it until this matter should be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that this document be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to hear the document read. We do not all have an opportunity to go to the Clerk's desk and read it. It is not very long.

Mr. FESSENDEN and others. Let it be printed and referred.

The motion of Mr. POMEROY, that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, was agreed to.

The message is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Experience has fully demonstrated the wisdom of the framers of the Federal Constitution. Under all circumstances the result of their labors was as near an approximation to perfection as was compatible with the fallibility of man. Such being the estimation in which the Constitution is and has ever been held by our countrymen, it is not surprising that any proposition for its alteration or amendment should be received with reluctance and distrust. While this sentiment deserves commendation and encouragement as a useful preventive of unnecessary attempt to change its provisions, it must be conceded that time has developed imperfections and omissions in the Constitution, the reformation of which has been demanded by the best interests of the country. Some of these have been remedied in the manner provided in the Constitution itself. There are others which, although heretofore brought to the attention of the people, have never been so presented as to enable the popular judgment to determine whether they should be corrected by means of additional amendments. My object in this communication is to suggest certain defects in the Constitution which seem to me to require correction, and to recommend that the judgment of the people be taken on the amendments proposed.

The first of the defects to which I desire to direct attention is in that clause of the Constitution which provides for the election of President and Vice President through the intervention of electors, and not by an immediate vote of the people.

The importance of so amending this clause as to secure to the people the election of President and Vice President, by their direct votes, was urged with great earnestness and ability by President Jackson in his first annual message, and the recommendation was repeated in five of his subsequent communications to Congress, extending through the eight years of his administration. In his message of 1829, he said:

"To the people belongs the right of electing their Chief Magistrate; it was never designed that their choice should in any case be defeated, either by the intervention of electoral colleges, or by the agency confided, under certain contingencies, to the House of Representatives."

He then proceeded to state the objections to an election of President by the House of Representatives, the most important of which was that the choice of a clear majority of the people might be easily defeated. He then closed the argument with the following recommendation:

"I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of President and Vice President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election; and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for by confining the second to a choice between the two highest candidates. In connection with such an amendment it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of four or six years. If, however, it should not be adopted it is worthy of consideration whether a provision disqualifying for office the Representatives in Congress on whom such an election may have devolved, would not be proper."

Although this recommendation was repeated with undiminished earnestness in several of his succeeding messages, yet the proposed amendment was never adopted and submitted to the people by Congress. The danger of a defeat of the people's choice in an election by the House of Representatives remains unprovided for in the Constitution, and would be greatly increased if the House of Representatives should assume the power arbitrarily to reject the votes of a State which might not be cast in conformity with the wishes of the majority in that body.

But if President Jackson failed to secure the amendment to the Constitution which he urged so persistently, his arguments contributed largely to the formation of party organizations, which have effectually avoided the contingency of an election by the House of Representatives. These organizations, first by a resort to the caucus system of nominating candidates, and afterward to State and national conventions, have been successful in so limiting the number of candidates as to escape the danger of an election by the House of Representatives.

It is clear, however, that in thus limiting the number of candidates, the true object and spirit of the Constitution have been evaded and defeated. It is an essential feature in our republican system of government that every citizen possessing the constitutional qualifications has a right to become a candidate for the office of President or Vice President, and that every qualified elector has a right to cast his vote for any citizen whom he may regard as worthy of these offices. But under the party organizations which have prevailed for years, these asserted rights of the people have been as effectually cut off and destroyed as if the Constitution itself had inhibited their exercise. The danger of a defeat of the popular choice in an election by the House of Representatives is no greater than in an election made nominally by the people themselves, when by the laws of party organizations and by the constitutional provisions requiring the people to vote for electors instead of for the President or Vice President, it is made impracticable for any citizen to be a candidate except through the process of a party nomination, and for any voter to cast his suffrage for any other person than one thus brought forward through the manipulations of a nominating convention. It is thus apparent that by means of party organizations that provision of the Constitution which requires the election of President and Vice President to be made through the electoral colleges has been made instrumental and potential in defeating the great object of conferring the choice of these officers upon the people. It may be conceded that party organizations are inseparable from republican government, and that, when formed and managed in subordination to the Constitution, they may be valuable safeguards of popular liberty; but when they are perverted to purposes of bad ambition they are liable to become the dangerous instruments of overthrowing the Constitution itself. Strongly impressed with the truth of these views, I feel called upon by an imperative sense of duty to revive substantially the recommendation so often and so earnestly made by President Jackson, and to urge that the amendment to the Constitution herewith presented, or some similar proposition, may be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection.

Recent events have shown the necessity of an amendment to the Constitution distinctly defining the persons who shall discharge the duties of President of the United States in the event of a vacancy in that office by the death, resignation, or removal of both the President and Vice President. It is clear that this should be fixed by the Constitution, and not be left to repealable enactments of doubtful constitutionality. It occurs to me that in the event of a vacancy in the office of President, by the death, resignation, disability, or removal of both the President and Vice President, the duties of the office should devolve upon an officer of the executive department of the Government, rather than one connected with the legislative or judicial departments. The objections to designating either the President pro tempore of the Senate or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, especially in the event of a vacancy produced by removal, are so obvious and so unanswerable that they need not be stated in detail. It is enough to state that they are both interested in producing a vacancy, and, according to the provisions of the Constitution, are members of the tribunal by whose decree a vacancy may be produced.

Under such circumstances the impropriety of designating either of these officers to succeed the President so removed is palpable. The framers of the Constitution when they referred to Congress the settlement of the succession to the office of President in the event of a vacancy in the offices of both President and Vice President, did not, in my opinion, contemplate the designation of any other than an officer of the executive department on whom, in such a contingency, the powers and duties of the President should devolve. Until recently the contingency has been remote, and serious attention has not been called to the manifest incongruity between the provision of the Constitution on this subject and the act of Congress of 1792. Having, however, been brought almost face to face with this important question, it seems an eminently proper time for us to make the legislation conform to the language, intent, and theory of the Constitution, and thus place the executive department beyond the reach of usurpation, and remove from the legislative and judicial departments every temptation to combine for the absorption of all the powers of Government.

It has occurred to me that in the event of such a vacancy the duties of President would devolve most appropriately upon some one of the heads of the several Executive Departments; and, under this conviction, I present for your consideration an amendment to the Constitution on this subject, with the recommendation that it be submitted to the people for their action.

Experience seems to have established the necessity of an amendment of that clause of the Constitution which provides for the election of Senators to Congress by the Legislatures of the several States. It would be more consistent with the genius of our form of Government if the Senators were chosen directly by the people of the several States. The objections to the election of Senators by the Legislatures are so palpable that I deem it unnecessary to do more than submit the proposition for such an amendment, with the recommendation that it be opened to the people for their judgment.

It is strongly impressed on my mind that the tenure of office by the judiciary of the United States, during good behavior for life, is incompatible with the spirit of republican government, and in this opinion I am fully sustained by the evidence of popular judgment upon this subject in the different States of the Union. I therefore deem it my duty to recommend an amendment to the Constitution by which the terms of the judicial officers would be limited to a period of years, and I herewith present it in the hope that Congress will submit it to the people for their decision.

The foregoing views have long been entertained by me. In 1845, in the House of Representatives, and afterward, in 1860, in the Senate of the United States, I submitted substantially the same propositions as those to which the attention of Congress is herein invited.

Time, observation, and experience have confirmed these convictions; and, as a matter of public duty, and with a deep sense of my constitutional obligation, "to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as I deem necessary and expedient," I submit the accompanying propositions, and urge their adoption and submission to the judgment of the people. ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 18, 1868.

Joint resolution proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Whereas the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States provides for amendments thereto, in the manner following, namely:

1. Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution, or on the application of the Legis-tures of two thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by convention in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution:

That hereafter the President and Vice President of the United States shall be chosen for the term of six years by the people of the respective States, in the manner following: each State shall be divided by the Legislatures thereof in districts equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress of the United States; the said districts to be composed of contiguous territory, and to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled to be represented under the Constitution, and to be laid off, for the first time, immediately after the ratification of this amendment; that, on the first Thursday in August, in the year 18—, and on the same day every sixth year thereafter, the citizens of each State who possess the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures shall meet within their respective districts and vote for a President and Vice President of the United States; and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President, and the one receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President in each district, shall be held to have received one vote; which fact shall be immediately certified by the Governor of the State to each of the Senators in Congress from such State, and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Congress of the United States shall be in session on the second Monday in October in the year 18—, and on the same day on every sixth year thereafter; and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given; but if no person have such a majority, then a second election shall be held on the first Thursday in the month of December then next ensuing, between the persons having the two highest numbers for the office of President, which second election shall be conducted, the result certified, and the votes counted, in the same manner as in the first, and the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President. But if two or more persons shall have received the greatest number of votes, at the second election, then the person who shall have received the greatest number of votes in the greatest number of States shall be President. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President, at the first election, shall be Vice President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given; and if no person have such majority, then a second election shall take place between the persons having the two highest numbers, on the same day that the second election is held for President; and the person having the highest number of votes for Vice President shall be Vice President. But if there should happen to be an equality of votes between the persons so voted for at the second election, then the person having the greatest number of States shall be Vice President. But when a second election shall be necessary in the case of Vice President, and not necessary in the case of President, then the Senate shall choose a Vice President from the persons having the two highest numbers in the first election, as is now prescribed in the Constitution: Provided, That after the ratification of this amendment to the Constitution, the President and Vice President shall hold their offices, respectively, for the term of six years, and that no President or Vice President shall be eligible for reelection to a second term.

And be it further resolved, That article two, section one, paragraph six, of the Constitution of the United States shall be amended so as to read as follows: "In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death or resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President, and in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice President, the powers and duties of said office shall devolve upon the Secretary of State for the time being, and after this officer, in case of vacancy in that or in other Departments, and in the order in which they are named, on the Secretary of the Treasury, on the Secretary of War, on the Secretary of the Navy, on the Secretary of the Interior, on the Postmaster General, and on the Attorney General; and such officer on whom the powers and duties of President shall devolve, in accordance with the foregoing provisions, shall then act as President until the disability shall be removed or a President shall be elected, as is or may be provided by law."

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That article one, section three, be amended to read as follows: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the persons qualified to vote for the members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote."

Sec. 4. And be it further resolved. That article three, section one, be amended to read as follows:

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress from time to time may ordain and establish. The judges of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during the term of twelve years, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. And it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twelve months after the ratification of this amendment by three fourths of all the States, as provided by the Constitution of the United States, to divide the whole number of judges, as near as may be practicable, into three classes. The seats of the judges of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the fourth year from such classification, of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the twelfth year, so that one third may be chosen every fourth year thereafter.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of contracts made by the Quartermaster's department during the month ending June 30, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 319) in regard to charges of desertion in cases of soldiers honorably discharged; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 345) relative to printing specifications of patents.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 485) to aid the improvement of the Des Moines and Rock Island rapids in the Mississippi river;

A bill (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of John A. Neustaedter;

A bill (H. R. No. 1284) imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 326) for the relief of Henry B. St. Marie;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 331) to grant American register to Hawaiian brig Victoria;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 338) exonerating certain vessels of the United States from the payment of tonnage fees to consular agents in Canada; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Z. M. Hall.

FOURTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, ratifying the amendment to the Constitution, of the United States, proposed to the several States by a joint resolution of Congress passed on the 13th day of June, 1860, to be designated as article fourteen of amendments to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 319) in regard to charges of desertion in cases of soldiers honorably discharged was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 345) relative to printing specifications of patents was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PROPOSED EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Before the Senator from Michigan proceeds I wish to make a motion that the Senate take a recess to-day from five o'clock to seven and a half. I wish this evening to pass a bill from the House of Representatives making an appropriation for the charitable institutions of this District. Those appropriations are in a separate bill, which ought to be passed before we adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Had we not better determine the question of a recess at a later hour? We may by sitting to six do all the work to-day that we need.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I withdraw the motion for the present, but I shall renew it by and by.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor on the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I rise rather to indicate my own opinion in reference to the subject-matter of this bill than with the expectation of shedding any particular light on the subject. I think the bill in its preamble and in its second section lays down the true American doctrine. It declares in the preamble that "the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right," and to this I wish to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. The preamble declares that the right of expatriation is an inherent and natural right. I suppose, as he has reported the bill from the Committee on Foreign Relations, that I may safely claim that he is of the same opinion.

Mr. SUMNER assented.

Mr. HOWARD. That is agreed; and then the second section declares that "all naturalized citizens of the United States in foreign States shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances." This is very clear. It is according to the recital contained in the preamble, for if the right of expatriation exists in its entirety and is inherent and natural in man as man, and a person born in a foreign land becomes naturalized under our laws, and thus a citizen of the United States, then it is perfectly logical that he should receive the same protection exactly, nothing more, nothing less than that which is due to a native born. And to this I understand the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to give his assent. The bill says so, at least, and he holds himself, I take it, responsible for the contents of the bill as amended by the committee.

The honorable Senator has also informed the Senate that the great American doctrine is already in part recognized by treaties which we have recently entered into with other nations of the world, and is about to become recognized by all the other Powers of the earth; and I suppose we may anticipate that at no distant future period a treaty will be entered into with Great Britain in which the great American principle of which he speaks will be contained. But, Mr. President, is the doctrine of this bill as announced in its preamble and in its second section in any way the doctrine of the treaties to which he refers and which he claims as being indices of the great American doctrine? Not at all, sir. They are as wide apart as the poles. The treaty to which he refers is in these words, and I may now refer to it because I suppose it is already public:

"The citizens of the Northern German Confederation who become naturalized citizens of the United States, and shall have resided uninterruptedly within the United States for five years, shall be held by the North German Confederation to be American citizens and shall be treated as such."

I do not know what may be the opinions of the honorable Senator from California on the subject of the principle thus announced, or whether he favored the ratification of the treaty or not. If he did favor it, then it is entirely clear that both he and the learned head of the Foreign Committee committed a great and marvelous error if the doctrines of this bill are the true doctrines. This great American principle, which has been heralded abroad as the panacea for all national difficulties that are likely to arise out of the subject of naturalization, is a complete renunciation of the fundamental doctrines of the bill before us, for it asserts this principle that although a foreign-born person may be naturalized under the laws of the United States, and thus become a naturalized citizen, he is not to be entitled to the rights of a native-born citizen of the United States unless he has resided consecutively five years within the limits of the United States, and we all know that we can naturalize him whenever he applies and upon whatever length or brevity of residence we see fit.

Now, sir, I rise to say that while I favor the fundamental doctrine of the bill; while I assert in its plenitude the duty and the power of the Government of the United States to consent to extend this protection to a naturalized citizen whenever he has become naturalized, I deny that this treaty from which I have read does announce the American principle. It is an abandonment of the great leading American principle of the absolute right of expatriation; and for that reason I never have been able to bring myself to consent to the ratification of that kind of treaty, holding, as I do, that inasmuch as the Constitution gives to Congress full power over the subject of naturalization, it is the duty of the Government to protect the naturalized citizen from and after the moment of his naturalization; and if we see fit so to declare, it is not necessary that he should reside in this country but a single day.

In short, Mr. President, I hold that when Uncle Sam has said to a foreign-born person that he is and henceforth shall be treated as a citizen of the United States, from that moment forth it becomes the duty of the Government to see to it that he is as well protected and as promptly protected in all his rights as a citizen of the United States as if he were born in this country. I will not yield a particle of the constitutional power belonging to Congress upon this subject. I will not say to foreign Governments "Although the power of Congress is plenary on this subject, still you have us in your grasp; we have entered into a contract by which we are no longer at liberty to extend the rights of citizenship in cases where the party has not resided within the limits of the United States for five years." That I hold to be an abdication of one of the constitutional functions of Congress which never ought to have been recognized. I do not regard it as the American doctrine at all; it is of recent invention, and I believe it will never receive the sanction of the people of the United States.

I shall, then, sir, vote with pleasure for the second section. I should prefer not to vote for the first section, because I think it is utterly unnecessary. It declares that "any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government." I see no necessity of asserting an abstract principle in that form. It is entirely immaterial to the Government of the United States what opinions its officers at various times and in various places may have entertained or expressed on the question of expatriation, as immaterial as if expressed by a foreigner. I should choose also to strike out the whole of the third section, and even the amendment annexed to it by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I would dispense with the whole of it. It will do no good. It has in it no vitality even in the form in which it has been amended by the committee. But least of all would I place in the hands of the President of the United States an authority to make reprisals upon the persons of foreign-born subjects who may happen to be within the limits of the United States. On this subject, I think the principles asserted by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts are entirely correct. We ought not to imperil the country by placing in the irresponsible hands of the President of the United States or of any other person the authority to commit this preliminary act of war, and we know that it is so regarded in all the codes upon international law. It would be next to impossible in many cases which we can conceive to avoid a war in case this power now proposed to be given to the President were in his hand; and I hope it will be stricken out. I do not like, Mr. President, these continual efforts on the part of some persons to infuse more and more into the habitudes of Congress and into the minds of the American people the principle of absolutism, the one-man power; and I think, as the Senator from Massachusetts has remarked, that there is no instance in our history in which it has been proposed to place in the hands of the President so dangerous a power as this. Why, sir, if he possessed it he might in a moment of pique or ill nature, and without any real cause, involve the whole country in the flames of civil war with some foreign nation without the intervention of Congress and without any consideration on the part of the representatives of the people. That, sir, is too absolute a power entirely to be intrusted to any man in this country.

I hope, therefore, that the third section will be entirely stricken out, leaving the whole subject where it properly belongs, as a subject of negotiation between our own and foreign Governments to be conducted under the supervision of the President through our proper diplomatic agents abroad. I see no necessity for this hot haste to get into a quarrel or a dispute with some other Government; but let us carry out simply and solely the American doctrine which is so clearly stated in the bill, that expatriation is an inherent and natural right, and that the naturalized citizen has precisely the same rights as the native born. Let this be understood by the President and our diplomats abroad, and I will give my word for it, however much or however little it may be worth, that we shall put an end to all these bickerings about naturalized citizens very soon.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. I desire to be informed by the Senator from Michigan what he understands by the right of expatriation mentioned in the preamble to this bill. Is it a right whose exercise or enjoyment is complete in the individual himself; or must there be super-added to the act of his own the act of the country of his new domicile before the right of expatriation is complete?

Mr. HOWARD. As generally understood, I think the honorable Senator from Connecticut will concur with me in holding that expatriation is held to be an individual right of the person expatriating himself, or in other words leaving his own native country. It is the individual will of the emigrant. I so understand.

Mr. FERRY. How does the expatriation become completed so as to dissolve the original allegiance? By the act of the individual alone, or by that act concurrently with the act of the Government to which he transfers his allegiance?

Mr. HOWARD. That, of course, would be a matter of legislative arrangement. The act of expatriation in and of itself, I take it, goes only to this extent: the emigration of the foreigner from his native land to some other land non animo revertendi; that is, with the intention of changing his domicile and making his permanent home in the country to which he emigrates. That I understand to be expatriation.

Mr. FERRY. And that is complete without any act of the Government to whose territory he has repaired?

Mr. HOWARD. I think so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word in consequence of the expression of opinion just made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan. I understand him, in the opinion that he has expressed, to speak unfavorably of the treaties which have recently been made with the North German Confederation and with Bavaria, and one which is about being made with Mexico, and another soon, we trust, to be made with Great Britain. Knowing that his opinion going out to the country will have weight, I wish simply to call attention to an answer to the objection which he makes to these treaties.

The opinion of the distinguished Senator is that these treaties violate what he calls the great American doctrine, which he alleges to be the right of expatriation, the right of any foreigner coming to this country to acquire citizenship, if in accordance with our laws, immediately. Now, I cannot conceive of any principle more certain to be injurious to the country than the foreigner comes from and to the country to which he comes, than that which the Senator avows. It is injurious, certainly, to the country that he leaves, because all that a citizen of Germany would have to do, if his principle were to be adopted, would be to come to America and here become a citizen, and then he could immediately return to Germany and for the rest of his life he would be relieved from military duty and from all obligation to that country, and this nation be under obligation all the time to protect him in that exemption from liability to that country.

And, Mr. President, it is injurious to this country, because what we want of these naturalized citizens is to have them residents here, to have their industry, their labor, to have them make this their home; but, according to the Senator's principle, they will have attained their whole object of being exempt from the exactions and tyranny of their native country by staying here for a single week, and they can return to their own country free from all liabilities there, while we gain no possible benefit by their having become our citizens. I think that the treaties which have been made with Bavaria and with North Germany, based upon the idea of five years' continuous residence, are profitable for the country from which these persons come as well as to this country.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, the stress of the remarks made by the honorable Senator from California was connected almost entirely with a case which he considers one of great outrage, the case of Colonel Halpin, who, it seems, was arrested in Great Britain and convicted there and sentenced to imprisonment—

Mr. CONNESS. There are other cases. I only took that as a specimen.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not like that there should go forth from this Chamber remarks such as those made by the honorable Senator from California, which, if I understand him correctly, rested upon the allegation that the arrest, conviction, and imprisonment of Colonel Halpin in England was for words spoken and acts done by him in the United States. This is a matter of fact about which I think the honorable Senator from California should be very sure when he speaks, and should not say anything more than he knows to be the fact. In order to elicit a response from the honorable Senator I venture to deny the correctness of that statement. I venture to say that in no instance has any American citizen ever been convicted in a British court and sentenced to imprisonment merely for acts done and words spoken in the United States. I venture this upon general grounds, without having examined the case of Colonel Halpin. I do it with the express purpose of calling upon the honorable Senator from California to say here whether that was the sole ground of the conviction of Colonel Halpin?

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it is a matter of even common notoriety. The Senator need not say it is not. The facts have been laid before us in a report from the State Department and the correspondence connected with this case. I mean to say that it is so patent that it is commonly known that the British Government have been in the habit, for a long time past, since the organization of what is known as the Fenian organization in the United States and in Ireland, of causing the arrest of Americans arriving in Ireland upon suspicion that they belong to that organization and party. The fact that they are found there is a prima facie case against them, and if in connection with that, as has been the case on some of those trials, they can prove, as they have proved by witnesses directly from the United States, and who are employed by the British agents in the United States to collect testimony, that the parties thus arrested have made speeches implicating the British Government, and arraigning it for acts of injustice toward Ireland; that evidence has been received by the courts for their conviction; and it is a matter of belief with me, a matter of which I have no doubt, that not the case of Colonel Halpin alone, but many, many like cases have occurred where the most unjust convictions have been had.

Mr. DRAKE. And so it appears, Mr. President, just as I supposed, that the evidence that was given in the British court of the words spoken by Colonel Halpin in the United States was given merely to prove the animus of acts done by him upon British soil.

Mr. SUMNER. That was it.

Mr. DRAKE. Merely for that purpose?

Mr. SUMNER. And that is the American law.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not wish—I should feel humiliated as a Senator of the United States—to have it go forth from this Chamber that the United States had stood still and allowed an American citizen to be convicted in a British court and immured in a British prison merely for words that he spoke in the United States; and I wish it now to go forth to the people of the country from this place, within the very hour in which the fact has been alleged by the honorable Senator from California, that the only use made in England of the words spoken by Colonel Halpin in the United States was to illustrate and exhibit the animus of acts done by him upon British soil. Now, sir, I say that an American court would take that very kind of evidence with regard to any foreigner whom we might arrest here for crimes against this country. Sir, I put it to the Senator from California to say whether if during the rebellion the Atlantic cable had been in existence, and our Government had been advised through it that some prominent individual in that country had announced at a public meeting there his sympathy with the rebellion in this country and his purpose to come over here and take up arms, or commit some other crime against the Government of the United States in conspiracy with rebels, and we had met him as he entered the country to engage in the perpetration of that crime, whether the judge before whom he should be tried for the conspiracy, be he a civil or military judge, would not have received the evidence of witnesses going to show what he declared his purpose to be before he left the foreign country to come here.

Mr. President, I do not desire to see the Congress of the United States invoked to any step that will go to protect a man under such circumstances from the laws of the country in which he commits the criminal act, to illustrate the character of which his previous words in the United States are given in evidence. I do not wish this country to set such an example. What would the Senate say if a man were convicted of crime in a court in this country according to the law of the land and England should undertake to put her hand over here and wrest him from the grasp of our laws and from the just punishment of his offense? Sir, let us not do to other countries what we would not for a moment permit another country to do to us.

Mr. President, there is another thing about this matter which rather excites my curiosity. If we are to give to our citizens the unlimited protection demanded by the Senator from California of course he will not object that every other nation whose people come to our shores should give the same protection to them. And yet, sir, that Senator represents a State which brings the whole power of its laws to bear with such an oppression upon people of another nation, as he, with the sentiments expressed by him here to-day, would not for an instant tolerate when exercised by any other nation upon American citizens. Sir, what would he say if China should demand at our doors the rights of her people as he thunders for the rights of our citizens at the doors of Great Britain to-day?

It has got into the newspapers that there is a treaty pending in this body which is intended to guaranty to Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may be here enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. If that be true I would like to know what is to be the position of the Senator from California in regard to that provision in the treaty. Does he recognize the same right in China to demand the protection of her subjects here that he demands now for the protection of American citizens in England?

Mr. WILSON. Do not discuss the treaty.

Mr. DRAKE. I am not discussing the treaty. I say that it has got into the newspapers that there is such a treaty. Suppose there should be such a treaty here, where is the Senator from California to be with reference to the principle laid down in it of equality of rights in this country on the part of that race, to which the people of California deny equality of rights, taxing them as they tax no others, keeping them down, if I am correctly informed, as southern rebels would keep the negro down, denying that they are human beings, or, the next thing to it, killing them as soon, as coolly, and with as much impunity as a Texan kills a negro? Well, sir, all that I have to say is that what is just for one is just for another, and as I go for protecting American citizens, native or naturalized, all over the world, I go for allowing other nations to do for their citizens or subjects here exactly what I would have this nation do for its citizens in other countries; no more, no less.

Now, Mr. President, as to the bill before us, I am firmly and resolutely an advocate of its fundamental principles. I go for protecting the American citizen, the naturalized equally with the native, in every quarter of the globe; but I do not go for protecting an American citizen, or a hundred or a thousand of them, at the expense of the innocent. I do not go for impoverishing whole communities in England and the United States both by a suspension of commercial relations between the two countries because the Government of Great Britain may put its hand unjustly upon one individual or a hundred who are citizens of the United States; least of all do I go for any such thing as catching up innocent citizens of that country who may be traveling here under the guarantee of public faith under the laws of nations and putting them in prison and keeping them there for the act of their Government, in which they took no part. There are other and better ways of dealing with the subject. Sir, no man can stand in this land upon that principle, unless he will agree to accord the same thing to every other nation in regard to any encroachments upon or wrongs to their citizens committed in this country; and I would like to see the honorable Senator from California agreeing to let Great Britain seize upon American citizens there and imprison them because we got an Englishman, a Scotchman, a Welshman, or an Irishman here, who made himself amenable to our criminal laws, and convicted him and put him in prison. Sir, it is no use to talk of that kind of thing at all.

Mr. CONNESS. I only wish to say one word.

Mr. WILSON. We have a special order for four o'clock; and I wish to know if the Senator desires and intends to go on with his bill till he finishes it.

Mr. CONNESS. I will consent, with the consent of the Senate generally, to let this go over as unfinished business. I simply wish to say that as the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] sees fit to make up his own case he makes out a very strong one. He puts me in the attitude of defending an intentionally hostile act in a foreign State with which our nation is at peace, and he denies that this country should be held to support any of its citizens in the perpetration of such an act. I stated that, as I understood it, when I was up; and upon that proposition there can be no difference between the honorable Senator and myself; but he went on to say that as he understood it the offense of the British Government consisted, when prosecuting these parties, in using testimony obtained in the United States to show the animus with which they went abroad. Mr. President, it is not difficult for the British Government to obtain testimony in Great Britain to convict persons of Irish nationality, no matter whether they remain domiciled in Ireland or have become expatriated and taken citizenship in the United States. If the case is to be thus made up that a man of Irish extraction and nativity, who returns to his native land or to any part of Great Britain, is to be held to return under the suspicion that prima facie he goes there to commit crime and that words spoken and acts done in the United States are to prove that that was the case, then there is but one other link in the chain of testimony necessary to convict him and deprive him of his liberty; and that is to obtain some perjured man for a price to swear that he saw him do it. That is what I allege has been done. I simply demand that our Government shall inquire and find the facts, and that finding the facts not to be as stated by the honorable Senator from Missouri, (for if they were to be so found, he and I could not disagree,) but to be that an innocent man and a citizen of ours has been deprived of liberty, it shall become the duty of this Government to demand his release; and if that be refused, and the refusal persisted in, then the highest duty of this Government consists in securing that release at any cost. That is my case.

Permit me to say on the other subject to which the Senator referred, that when the treaties come up we will discuss it.

Mr. DRAKE. I merely wish to say that the position just taken by the honorable Senator from California converts the Government of the United States in the given case into a court of errors to reverse the decision of the British courts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 18, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. H. DE HAAS, D. D., of Washington. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS OF MEMBERS-ELECT.

Mr. DAWES presented the credentials of John B. Callis, claiming to have been elected a Representative from the fifth congressional district of Alabama; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES also presented the credentials of W. Jasper Blackburn, claiming to have been elected a Representative from the fifth congressional district of Louisiana; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield for a few moments to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAFLIN,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed ten thousand copies of the internal revenue law lately passed, six thousand for the use of the House, and four thousand for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION LAWS, ETC.

Mr. LAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed so many of the general and special orders pertaining to reconstruction transmitted from the War Department as may appear to the Committee on Printing necessary to indicate the extent of powers exercised by commanders of the military district created in the reconstruction act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATIONERY BUREAU.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law a stationery bureau from which all Departments of the Government in the District of Columbia shall obtain supplies of stationery.

Mr. JENCKES. I wish to state for the information of the House that that subject is already being considered by the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. LAFLIN. Then I withdraw the resolution.

PRINTING OF PATENT SPECIFICATIONS.

Mr. ELA, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 345) relative to printing specifications of patents; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that no bills shall be paid by the Treasurer for printing specifications of patents above the contract price except that seventy cents may be added to each thousand words for the additional cost of composition occasioned by change made in printing by order of the Committee on Patents.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from New Hampshire, who has been examining into the subject of printing for the Patent Office, to state the facts upon which that resolution is founded. I understand that there are some great abuses there which the House should understand at once, and I desire the gentleman from New Hampshire either to make a verbal statement or to have his report read.

Mr. ELA. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, in obedience to the resolution of the House instructing them to inquire whether the Commissioner of Patents has procured any printing, binding, or blank books except at the Government Printing Office, and if so, to what amount, of whom, and by what authority of law, report:

That they find the Commissioner of Patents is procuring printing, binding, and blank books outside the Government Printing Office, and without authority of law. The present acting commissioner temporarily in the office has made no changes, but followed the precedents and practices of the office as he found them, except that payment for printing of the specifications of patents has been suspended since February, 1868.

We have therefore confined our examination mainly to a period commencing with the printing of specifications of patents instead of having them written, in November, 1866, and extending down to the time the Commissioner (Hon. T. C. Theaker) resigned in January, 1868.

The persons employed and the amount paid to each is as follows, from November 26, 1866, to January, 1868:

To Philp & Solomons:
Printing from November 23, 1866, to January 31, 1868.....	$81,718 33
For paper used in printing.....	26,091 66
For blank books and binding.....	3,847 25
To Dempsey & O'Toole:
For printing.....	26,380 50
Paper for printing.....	28,680 00
Blank books and binding.....	12,896 65
To McGill & Witherow:
Printing.....	355 75
To William H. Nailey:
Blank books.....	2,437 30
Total.....	$181,810 34

The committee are of the opinion that this large sum has been expended in opposition to the law, following the practice before there was any law regulating it; and which course is sought to be justified upon the ground that the expense is paid from the patent fund and not from the Treasury. It is but just to the Commissioner to say that he claims his action to have met the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

A large part of this sum, amounting to $74,556 58, is for composition and press-work on specifications of patents, under a contract made with Philp & Solomons on the 12th of July, 1866. This contract provided for printing ten copies of each specification for twenty-seven cents per hundred words—the Patent Office to furnish the paper—and for each additional copy one cent per hundred words. The contract provided that the type for the specifications should be set in double columns for each page. Before any were furnished under the contract specimen samples were printed and shown the Commissioner, one of which was in single column, which he considered the most “artistic,” and decided to have the work done in that form. This change added to the cost of the work only by increasing the measurement of the composition when performed by the piece, and the Commissioner without making new arrangements paid the contractors an advance of sixty-seven per cent, upon the first ten copies.

An extraordinary feature of the contract was that the Commissioner furnished the paper for this printing. It has been purchased at the cost of eighty dollars per thousand sheets, when, in the opinion of the committee, thirty dollars would have been a very liberal price and very much above what three of the four bidders agreed to contract to furnish it for in June, 1868. The amount used in printing specifications is about one thousand sheets per day, yielding a daily profit of at least fifty dollars.

The Interior Department, which contracts for the stationery for the Patent Office, invited no competition for “bond paper” until 1868, and the committee of the Department to award contracts for 1868 sits in their report to the chief clerk of the Interior Department “that, in addition to the quantity on hand, an order had been given for three hundred thousand sheets, which had been furnished when the bids were opened, and of which fact the person representing the Patent Office on the committee was aware, and which he made known to the committee.”

Of the four parties bidding to furnish the Interior Department with stationery, Blanchard & Molun bid to furnish three hundred thousand sheets of bond paper for $2,500, Philp & Solomons for $8,250, Coyle & Towers for $7,000, and Dempsey & O'Toole for $20,000; yet, “in addition to the quantity on hand, an order was given and filled” before the bids were opened “for the same amount, for $24,000. The committee of the Interior Department go on to say “as the Patent Office would not need any more of the article in question,” the bids above named were “properly disregarded.” What will prevent the Patent Office from again paying $24,000 for the same quantity “before the bids are opened,” and again having bids for that kind of paper “properly disregarded?”

The manner in which supplies for the whole Interior Department are estimated, when advertising for contracts, will be seen when we state that averaging the highest and the lowest bids the whole aggregate amount advertised for was offered to be furnished for $20,758 42, while the Patent Office alone paid for paper for printing in fifteen months, $44,474 56.

The contract for printing specifications was made without advertising for competition or furnishing written specifications of what would be required. Parties were informed verbally, and the contract was made for three years. The reason offered for this course, and for not resorting to the Government Office, was that the work was very important, intricate, and difficult, such as the Government Office would not be likely to be able to perform in the manner and at the time required; and that it was such an experiment that a failure would be disastrous, and therefore none but the most responsible parties were invited to compete. The work may have been, and probably was, fully up to the specimen which the Commissioner selected, but the committee have been unable to discover anything but an ordinary specimen of printing, which, in style, reflects no credit upon the mechanical bureau of the country, and which could be “set up” and “worked off” by most apprentices in a country printing office.

The accounting officers of the Treasury seem to have passed these bills for printing outside the Government Office because they were paid out of the patent fund, and therefore not subject to the law requiring all printing for the “executive and judicial departments to be done at the Government Printing Office.”

The amendment to the appropriation bill made during the examination has provided against the continuance of this evil by again ordering all printing to be done at the Government Office, and covering all patent funds into the Treasury as other money goes there; and no further remedy is proposed.

That legislation was required in regard to the patent fund from the above statement, taken in connection with that which follows, will not be doubted. In 1865 there were 10,664 applications and 1,937 caveats filed in the Patent Office, and 6,616 patents issued. In 1867 there were 21,276 applications and 3,597 caveats filed, and 13,015 patents issued. The cash receipts in 1865 were $348,791 84, and in 1867 they were $646,581 92. Expenses in 1865 were $274,199 34, and in 1867 they were $639,263 32. These figures show that while the business and receipts of the Patent Office for 1867 were very near twice as much as in 1865, the expenses had increased to near three times as much as in 1865, reversing the ordinary rule that increase of business does not require a proportionate increase of expenditure. While the amount of business was doubled, the profits diminished from $74,592 50, in 1865, to $3,318 50, in 1867.

The committee did not investigate beyond the scope of the resolution, but it came out incidentally that a "considerable amount" of expense had been incurred for furniture by direction of the Secretary of the Interior on a contract made in the same manner as that for printing, and the report of the Commissioner of Patents made to the Senate in January, 1868, shows the contingent expenses of the office for the year 1867, including printing, to have been $260,812 85, besides $46,301 98 for permanent improvements, $16,819 60 for illustrations of report, and some $3,442 48 for other expenses.

When we find forty-eight dollars per thousand paid for Manila envelopes, nine by twelve inches, including printing Commissioner's frank; forty dollars per thousand for printed cards for patents, and $22 50 per thousand for small printed tag cards, while the best parchment paper, twenty-eight by thirty-two inches, is bid for at one cent per sheet, it would seem proper that some change should be made in the interest of the Treasury for furnishing stationery supplies for the several Departments of the Government.

No bills for printing specifications have been paid since February last, and we recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In view of the extraordinary facts developed in that report, I ask leave to offer the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the late Commissioner of Patents alleges he had the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the expenditures referred to in the report of the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That a copy of said report be transmitted to said Secretary, and that he be directed to communicate to Congress in relation thereto.

Mr. JENCKES. I object to that resolution at this time.

The question recurred upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. JENCKES. This report relates to two subjects, while the joint resolution names but one. Now, I wish to state to this House that this subject of stationery contracts for the Department of the Interior has been for some time under investigation by the Committee on Retrenchment, the investigation being authorized by a resolution of the Senate. What has been presented to the House by the Committee on Printing is the mere surface of that transaction. The Committee on Retrenchment have found this matter of sufficient importance to lead them to call before them all the officers who have had anything to do with these contracts, and they have taken a large amount of testimony. That which has been reported from the Committee on Printing, although it may be correct in some of its statements, is yet far from the truth in its results.

Mr. ELA. In what particular is it far from the truth in its results?

Mr. JENCKES. I will state to the gentleman. The figures which the gentleman gives us in his report are not the results of the sworn statements of the parties engaged in these transactions. They have been furnished to the Committee on Printing by interested parties who have not been successful in their negotiations with the Department of the Interior.

Mr. ELA. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. JENCKES. We have had those figures before the Committee on Retrenchment in precisely the same form, and we have found that they do not express the whole truth. We might have been misled, as the Committee on Printing seems to have been misled, if we had adopted those ex parte statements. But as I have said, we have called before us every officer of the Government connected with the transactions in question, and we will soon be ready to submit a report upon the whole subject of stationery contracts.

However, as the joint resolution of the Committee on Printing contemplates no action in that regard, what I have said is merely for information. As I heard the resolution read, it is not aimed at the stationery contracts, but is aimed at the printing, which is within the domain of the Committee on Printing. The stationery contracts are matters relating to the expenditures of the Government, and are within the province of the Committee on Retrenchment, and has received their consideration. There is undoubtedly great errors committed in the present mode of making those contracts. They are open to great frauds; frauds have been committed, and committed because of the defects in the law. They have taken advantage of the errors of our legislation, and have sheltered themselves in every instance of past transactions that we have been able to find out under cover of acts of Congress and regulations framed in accordance with those acts. The remedy for those evils in the future is to strike at the root of the matter, and to so frame our acts that bids for stationery shall be received, as they are now received for other articles, in fair competition, so that we can receive exactly what we propose to pay our money for. Then there will be no occasion for this investigation.

In regard to the other part of the report, the matter of printing specifications, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] seems to have overlooked the statute which expressly authorized the Secretary of the Interior to make contracts for printing these specifications. The law required them to keep fair records, and to furnish copies at the shortest possible notice. A great many copies of patents are required not only for use in this country but to be transmitted to other parts of the world. In carrying out the requirements of the law and meeting the wants of those dealing with the Patent Office the Commissioner was formerly obliged to employ a large force of copyists at a great expense, not to the office, because the expense does not ultimately fall on the patent fund but upon those requiring these copies. It was found, upon examination, that it would be much better to furnish printed copies of these specifications, much cheaper and more convenient for every one interested, than to employ a host of copyists to do poor work at a high price. But before ordering any such printing the authorization of statute law was procured. By the act of 1861 the Commissioner is authorized to have printed ten copies of every specification and two copies of a particular kind, one of them upon parchment, for reference in the office. That act was the foundation of this printing.

One word as to this patent fund, to which reference has been made. What is this patent fund? Why, sir, it is a fund by which inventors and others who have dealings with the office pay for the work which they get done there. If the gentleman from New Hampshire or I should desire a copy of a specification of a patent we would much prefer to have it in print, fair and legible, than in the careless writing and illegible characters of a bad copyist. I do not deny that in relation to the matters embraced in the report there may be a state of things requiring investigation; and this appears to have been the view of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in offering his resolution. He proposes to ask the Secretary of the Interior to report what has been done. I can answer the gentleman, and from evidence taken before the Committee of Retrenchment the Secretary of the Interior is undoubtedly responsible for all these stationery contracts; it rests with him to say whether they shall be continued or revoked. It is, it seems to me, out of the power of this House to interfere with the matter. It is undoubtedly true that there has been done by order of the different Departments printing which, under the construction given to the law by the Committee on Printing, should have been done at the Congressional Printing Office. But that is a matter of construction. The resolution should apply to all the departments of the Government as well as to the Department of the Interior, if it is to be made available at all. But in this matter of printing these specifications it is strictly a matter of discretion. There has been no violation of the statute. There is no statute authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to procure this printing to be done at the Public Printing Office. There is a statute which the Committee on Printing regard as requiring the printing to be done at the Public Printing Office. Every head of every Department, as the committee will bear me out in saying—every head of every Department of this Government, has construed the statute otherwise, and they have all had printing done elsewhere. Now, whether these specifications are well done or artistically done is a matter of no consequence. They are done for the convenience of parties. They are done for transmission, not only through this country, but throughout the world; and we receive in return for those we send to Europe specifications from England and France and a number of other countries which have patent laws to protect inventors.

I wish to say something about other matters incidentally referred to. It is complained of in the report that this expense was paid out of the patent fund. I wish the Committee on Printing and the members of this House to know what this fund is, how it has accumulated, whence it arose, and for what purpose it has been collected. In the early history of this Government we passed a patent law, in 1790, which requires this. From that down to 1856, when the patent laws were revised, the Government has been receiving $350,000 from inventors in fees.

Mr. ELA. I rise to a question of order, as to whether the gentleman is debating this question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is debating this joint resolution. It brings up the whole subject.

Mr. JENCKES. The question is whether it is payable out of the patent fund. When the Patent Office was destroyed in 1836 there was a balance to the credit of that office of $150,000, which, by solemn statute, the Congress of the United States, and every cent to be thereafter received by the Patent Office, as a sacred fund for the use of the inventors of this country. That stands upon the statute-book unrepealed. It is as much a dedication as if property were set apart by will for a specific purpose. It is as much dedicated to that purpose as any sum voted by Congress for any special charity in the District of Columbia. From that time the revenues of that office have steadily increased. I will give the House an idea of that fund. Within the last six months the inventors of the United States have paid into the Treasury—

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Ways and Means is indignant at me. I do not know what to do but to appeal to my friend from Rhode Island.

Mr. JENCKES. I will not abuse the courtesy of the gentleman. Within the last six months the inventors of the United States paid as patent fees more than for forty-three years previous to 1836. In this report—and I allude to it because it is in the report—it is complained the expenses have increased as the receipts have increased. Of course they have. When the receipts were fixed in 1851 they were fixed at so low a rate there could be no profit to the Patent Office. This exists simply for the purpose of encouraging the inventive genius of the country. It exists for the protection and transaction of their business. For every dollar they pay into the fund they are entitled to receive something. It is held for the purpose of promoting the useful arts. I wish to say something in regard to what was done in the committee of conference without anything said in the House and without anything in the committee upon which to hang it. That is deliberately to confiscate this entire fund, to cover it into the Treasury, and pay out how much? Why, for a year's appropriation less than half what is required for six months' business of that office. And this, too, came from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], who has sat here ever since I have been in Congress objecting to every measure of general legislation in appropriation bills; and yet not in Committee of the Whole, but in a committee of conference, where it could not be contested, he brought into the House and had the provision put through here without a word of explanation, without even the report itself being read, and it became a law without a single member of the House of Representatives, except those who constitute the committee, knowing anything about it. Here was this fund dedicated by statute, used and used well for the purposes for which it was appropriated and to which it should be applied; and now for the first time in the history of this Government, without notice, without even debate, it is undertaken to raise a revenue out of the inventive genius of the country, and yet refuse to them the business which they are entitled to have done in order that their inventions may avail them. I will not longer trespass upon the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES resumed the floor.

Mr. JENCKES. I give notice that I will move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] for ten minutes.

Mr. ELA. The gentleman is very much mistaken when he asserts that this report is made on hearsay evidence.

Mr. JENCKES. I did not say that; I said partially so.

Mr. ELA. The report is made upon the sworn statement of the Commissioner of Patents, the acting Commissioner at present, the chief clerk, and disbursing officer of that office, and the Comptroller of the Treasury; and in addition to that it is made from a report made by a committee for the purpose of awarding the contracts from the Interior Department. And now, Mr. Speaker, one word more in regard to the law under which the gentleman says this matter has been brought in. The law the gentleman refers to in relation to the Patent Office was repealed the next year after it was passed, leaving all this matter to the general law. And yet the gentleman has argued to the House that these expenses are paid under that law. He is also mistaken in supposing all the Departments are doing printing equally without law. The Treasury Department are authorized by law to perform certain printing, such as the envelopes they manufacture, circulars, and some other kinds of printing. I have not attempted in this report to go beyond the duties imposed by the House on the Committee on Printing. But, sir, if the mere surface-skimming which the gentleman alludes to develops such a system of corruption as this report shows, I would like to know what you would find if you should probe it to the center. Why, sir, this paper which the gentleman has spoken of, upon which specifications are printed, was offered to be furnished by three bidders, the highest of the bids being for three hundred thousand sheets at $7,000, and the lowest $2,500. And yet your acting commissioner, before the bids were opened, contracted for an amount above what was then on hand, for three hundred thousand sheets, at an expense of $24,000, which put into the pocket of the man who furnished the paper more than $15,000. I have no disposition to follow this matter further, because the law upon which the gentleman from Rhode Island founded his whole argument was repealed four years ago, and because the report states the matter fully. I now call the previous question.

Mr. JENCKES. Is not my motion to refer in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, for the gentleman was not on the floor to make that motion, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] having resumed it before that time.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 64, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JENCKES and ELA were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-two, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELA moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to my colleague to take up a matter if it does not cause debate.

Mr. BANKS. I ask to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the Alaska bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate amendments to the bill amending the postal laws for the purpose of non-concurring and having a committee of conference.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to taking any bill from the Speaker's table out of its order.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will not the gentleman allow the Senate amendments to the deficiency bill to be taken up?

Mr. SPALDING. No, sir; I object to any bill being taken up out of its regular order.

CHRISTOPHER C. CAREY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1436) for the relief of Christopher C. Carey, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CAPTAIN ISAAC A. TAYLOR.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1437) for the relief of Captain Isaac A. Taylor, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GEORGE W. KIRK.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1438) for the relief of Colonel George W. Kirk, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the votes by which the bills were severally referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOYAL CITIZENS OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution pledging the faith of the nation to the loyal citizens of Tennessee.

Mr. MULLINS. I object.

CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the joint resolution (H. R. No. 319) in regard to charges of desertion in cases of soldiers honorably discharged.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that in all cases where private soldiers in the late war for the Union served out the term of their enlistment and were honorably discharged from the service, or died in the service while in the line of duty, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War upon application of the parties to remove any charges of desertion that may stand on the rolls against such soldiers where there has not been a conviction for desertion by a court-martial.

Mr. WARD objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection, and the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—SWITZLER VS. ANDERSON.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections, to whom was recommended the report of that committee in the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson, have instructed me to report the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That in the matter of charges of disloyalty made by Hon. J. P. BENJAMIN against the contestant for a seat in this House from the ninth district of Missouri, and by the contestant against the sitting member, all the testimony taken in the manner prescribed in the act regulating contested elections, all the notices in each case to be served respectively upon the respondent and the person making the charge, and all the testimony to be filed with the Clerk of the House within ninety days from the passage of this resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is this privileged?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems to me that there can be no other purpose in the matter except to keep the contestant out of his seat until this Congress is ended.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, however, is privileged. It proposes to provide how the contest shall be continued.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the previous question to enable me to offer an amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I will hear it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved further, That the sitting member and the contestant be allowed within the time and in the manner mentioned in the above resolution to take additional testimony in relation to the character of the registration of Callaway county for the election of the year 1866.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield for that amendment to be offered. There is no reason given on either side why they had not sufficient time to take testimony. I yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. KERR.]

Mr. KERR. I hope the gentleman will not yield to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. DAWES. I have declined to yield.

Mr. KERR. Then I have nothing further to say.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report back the official notice of the ratification of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, and to ask that they be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Governor of the State of South Carolina, transmitting a joint resolution of the Legislature of that State, ratifying the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

LOUISIANA AND SOUTH CAROLINA MEMBERS.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections, to which were referred the credentials of persons claiming to have been elected members of this House from the State of Louisiana, namely, J. Hale Sypher, for the first district; James Mann, for the second district; Joseph P. Newsham, for the third district; Michael Vidal, for the fourth district; and W. Jasper Blackburn, for the fifth district; and from the State of South Carolina, B. F. Whittemore, for the first district, and James H. Goss, for the fourth district, to report that they have examined those credentials and have found them in due form of law, and that the State of Louisiana and the State of South Carolina have conformed in all respects to the requirements of the laws of Congress. The committee therefore recommend that those gentlemen be admitted to seats in this House upon taking the oath of office prescribed by the statute of July 2, 1862.

The report of the committee was agreed to. Mr. DAVES. As those gentlemen are now present, I ask that the oath be administered to them.

The following members-elect then presented themselves and took the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, namely: J. HALE SYRER, of Louisiana; JAMES MANN, of Louisiana; JOSEPH P. NEWSHAM, of Louisiana; MICHAEL VIDAL, of Louisiana; W. JASPER BLACKBURN, of Louisiana; B. F. WHITEMORE, of South Carolina; and JAMES H. GOSS, of South Carolina.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVES. There is one more matter of business that I wish to bring to the attention of the House. I refer to the contested-election case of McGroarty vs. Hooper, from the Territory of Utah. No member of the Committee of Elections desires to be heard upon the case; but the contestant desires to be heard briefly upon it, and then I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All right. Mr. SCHENCK. I would suggest to the gentleman to let that case go over until Monday next, when our most important matters of legislation will probably be before committees of conference.

Mr. DAVES. I have no desire to press it upon the attention of the House to the displacement of other business. But the Committee of Elections have reported adversely upon the claim of the contestant, and they do not desire to say a word upon it. I propose to call up the case in behalf of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] who made the report on behalf of the committee, but who is necessarily absent from the House. He made an arrangement with the contestant to call up the case to-day, but he has been called away, and has requested me to call it up. However, I will not call up the case until Monday, provided it be understood that I shall have the right to call up this case, and also the Missouri contested-election case of Hogan vs. Pile.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVES] proposes, after the funding bill shall have been disposed of, to call up the contested-election case of Hogan vs. Pile; which would not prevent the introduction of reports of committees of conference, several of which are nearly ready to be reported to the House.

Mr. DAVES. I do not propose to call up either case to-day, if I can have general consent to call them up on Monday next.

No objection was made.

Mr. DAVES. I now ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a bill for the relief of Simon Corlay, a Representative-elect from the State of South Carolina, from political disabilities. I do not think it will give rise to any debate.

Mr. MULLINS. I object. I expect to debate that bill when it is introduced; such is my intention.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

CORRECTION.

Mr. KERR. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a moment that I may make an explanation in regard to a paragraph in the Globe.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is not a "personal explanation?"

Mr. KERR. No, sir; a mere correction.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KERR. I find that in the discussion which took place yesterday on the funding bill I am reported as saying, referring to the taxability of greenbacks, "the statutes of the United States say so expressly." I simply desire to say that I did not make that statement. Some other gentleman made it, and my name has accidentally been prefixed to it. The statement which I made follows immediately the remark I have just quoted, and is correctly reported.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. No. 164) for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed House bills of the following titles, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1096) making appropriations of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia, of March 30, 1867;

An act (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of John A. Neustaedter;

An act (H. R. No. 485) to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines and Rock Island rapids in the Mississippi river;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 331) to grant an American register to the Hawaiian brig Victoria;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 338) exonerating certain vessels of the United States from the payment of tonnage fees to consular agents in Canada;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Z. M. Hall; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 326) for the relief of Henry B. Ste. Marie.

TEMPORARY LOAN CERTIFICATES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the House to take from the Speaker's table, by unanimous consent, for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, the bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to taking up any bill out of its order.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] who desires to make a statement in reference to the tariff bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, my usual motion has been, whenever a suitable opportunity has been presented, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the tariff bill. I do not propose to make that motion now. Upon consultation with my friends, and especially with the Committee of Ways and Means, this morning, (though our action was rather informal,) I have concluded that at this late stage of the session it is not best to press the tariff bill in antagonism to other business before the House, as it appears to me certain that this bill, if passed through the House, could not pass the Senate at this session. Upon consultation within the last two or three days with members of the Committee on Finance of the Senate I have become satisfied that if we should pass the bill here they would not take it up and act upon it this session. I therefore think it improper at this stage of the session to press further the tariff bill in antagonism with other business. While the tariff men of the country have reason to feel grateful to this House for the very strong support this measure has received whenever we have had a test vote, (the main test vote being 84 ayes to 57 noes,) I feel willing that the bill shall remain pending till the next meeting of Congress. And I wish to ask the Speaker to inform the House distinctly what position the bill will occupy when we meet in December next.

The SPEAKER. The tariff bill is now the unfinished business in Committee of the Whole; and when the House at the the next session of Congress shall resume the consideration in Committee of the Whole of the pending business this bill will be the first business in order unless it be set aside at that time by the vote of a majority.

Mr. RANDALL. Do I understand my colleague [Mr. MOORHEAD] to make a motion to postpone the consideration of the tariff bill?

Mr. MOORHEAD. No, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that if such a motion be made I shall object to it.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The gentleman will not have an opportunity to object, for I do not intend to make the motion. I understand from the Speaker of the House that a motion to postpone the bill till next session or a motion to make it a special order for a certain day would not place it in any more favorable position than it now occupies; and hence I am willing to leave it just where it is. It will now be in such a position that all the tariff men of the House can prepare themselves to take it up at the next session, framing in the mean time such amendments as they may think desirable.

Mr. RANDALL. They were prepared eight months ago.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I think it better that the bill should occupy this position than that it should be lying in the Senate without action. I therefore give notice that I will not again at this session undertake to call up this bill.

Mr. BROOKS. The tariff bill is dead.

BUSINESS OF EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to give notice that when the House shall this afternoon come out of Committee of the Whole on the funding bill I shall move, if I can get the floor for that purpose, that the session of this evening be set apart for the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope that will be done.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope it will not be done. I do not wish to have all those Senate bills put through without any reference or investigation.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is on the Speaker's table a large number of bills that should be disposed of in some way, by reference or otherwise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Under the rules of the House, can business on the Speaker's table be reached until after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot decide a point of order before it arises.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the funding bill, but I am willing to yield for ten or fifteen minutes for the transaction of business that may cause no division or debate.

DOORKEEPERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be instructed to retain in his service during the vacation of Congress all crippled soldiers now in his employ.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object unless it goes to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not object to that.

The resolution was so referred.

REMISSION OF PENALTIES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1439) authorizing the remission of penalties in certain cases; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that where it shall appear to the collector of any district within the United States, upon oath or otherwise, to his satisfaction that any instrument in writing was not duly stamped at the time of making or issuing the same, by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertence, or urgent necessity, and without willful design to defraud the United States of the stamp, or to evade or delay the payment of the tax on such instrument, then, if such instrument, or if the original be lost, a copy thereof, duly certified by the officer having charge of any records in which such original is required to be recorded, or, if not recorded, otherwise duly proved, to the satisfaction of the collector, shall within six calendar months after the 1st day of August, 1868, be brought to the said collector of revenue to be stamped, and the stamp tax chargeable thereon be paid, it shall be lawful for the said collector to remit the penalty provided by law, and to cause such instrument to be duly stamped.

Mr. ROSS. Will that cover deeds made in the southern States during the rebellion?

Mr. ALLISON. That class of cases is already covered by existing law, and this will extend the time in this and all other cases for six months.

Mr. ROSS. I have letters asking for such a law. Parties want an opportunity to affix the United States stamps to their instruments of writing.

Mr. ALLISON. This will cover all cases in every collection district of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRIAL OF BOILERS.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce a joint resolution authorizing the trial of boilers for steam vessels.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to permit the trial of any boiler or boilers of any other material than charcoal plates or wrought iron upon such steamboats or steamships as the manufacturers of said boiler or boilers may furnish, provided there be no expense to the Government arising therefrom.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. BROOKS. I now call for the regular order of business.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be now suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the committee will resume the consideration of Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

The Clerk read the pending section, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale or negotiation or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States, disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere, on account of the United States; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent, other than some proper officer of his Department, to make such sale or negotiation of bonds and securities are hereby repealed.

Amendments of the committee:

Strike out "or negotiation" and insert "negotiation or exchange;" and insert after the words "of the United States" the words "or of any coin or bullion."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That after the passage of this act all exchange, purchases, or sales of the bonds of the United States shall be made by inviting the competition of the public by advertising for proposals for any such exchange, purchase, or sale, which shall be awarded to the best bidder or bidders, the Secretary of the Treasury reserving the right to reject any such bids should he deem it to the public interest to do so.

I do not think the chairman of the committee will object to that. The object of the amendment is that when the exchanges of these bonds are made the public shall be made aware of exactly what is going on in the Treasury Department in that regard, so that the purchaser of a fifty-dollar bond shall know it just as a wealthy millionaire who takes his $100,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next and last amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, to add the following as a new section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the tax on any income arising from the bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States, payable to any person, State, municipality, body politic or corporate, company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be assessed and collected by the Treasurer or other disbursing officers of the United States, charged with paying any interest upon the debt of the United States, in the same currency in which said interest is paid, and such collection shall be made by deduction of the amount of the tax from the coupons or interest due at the time of payment of such interest.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to offer a substitute for the whole bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not yet in order. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the last section is reached I desire to offer a new section to come in after section four that has just been passed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the last section which has been read.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to add after the words "United States in the third line the words" "other than those authorized by the first section of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "the tax on any" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "there shall be a tax of five per cent. on any profits, gains, or;" so that it will read, "that hereafter there shall be a tax of five per cent. upon any profits, gains, or income arising from the bonds," &c. The proposition I make is this: we have an income tax apparently of five per cent. upon income arising from bonds, but we do not provide that it shall be collected anywhere except upon the conscience of the person holding the bonds. Now it is found that there is only one tenth of the income returned, because men can pass the coupons from hand to hand and nobody knows whose coupons they are or to whom the money is payable. Now I have offered an amendment to put the exact tax upon income arising from bonds as upon all other property in the United States, and have it honestly collected. The honest men now do pay; the dishonest men do not. We do not get more than $1,500,000 from the interest on bonds now; we ought to get $20,000,000, being eight per cent. on the interest on $2,500,000,000, taking the currency income. Now, I propose to tax this income at the source. Let every man who owns a bond pay his five per cent. precisely as we, when we go to our pay-rolls here, get our money with our five per cent. deducted, and as every other salaried officer or employé of the United States gets his money with the income tax deducted. All I desire now is to collect this at the place where it is payable, and I can see no objection to it. I moved the other day to put on a tax of ten per cent. I think it might be ten per cent. now. But I want to avoid that question now. I want simply to provide for the honest collection of the revenue from income on bonds, whoever holds them. Now, I shall be met with this objection: that this will collect the interest on bonds in the hands of foreigners. Well, sir, that is precisely what England has always done, and what precisely we do now when we order the income tax to be deducted from every railroad, canal, or other corporation bonds by the Treasurer. It was kept back and was put into the act of 1866, whether the owner is a non-resident alien or citizen.

Again, sir, with this honest collection of the tax, there will be a strong inducement for men to fund their bonds. There is no inducement now. They escape taxation now, and they have always escaped it; and the only effect of my proposition is to make men or corporations honestly pay their income tax on these bonds.

Mr. LYNCH. Suppose the income tax should be raised to ten per cent., or reduced to two and a half per cent., then will not this be a discrimination?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When that is done we can alter this. I am speaking of it as it is now. I do not know what it will be when it is altered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Two messages in writing from the President of the United States were presented by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyer general in the Territory of Utah, to establish a land office in said Territory, and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is at all necessary. The tax now upon all incomes arising from bonds of the United States and all other property is five per cent. As the section now stands the tax of five per cent. would be deducted from the interest on all bonds at the Treasury. Now the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] is a very good one, that if we should reduce the income tax to three per cent. upon all other classes of incomes, then this would remain at five per cent., which would be a discriminating tax against the holders of United States bonds, or if in any emergency we should raise the tax we would be compelled to amend this law or discriminate in favor of the holders of these bonds. The Committee of Ways and Means simply provide by this section that whatever tax is charged upon other incomes shall attach to the income derived from United States bonds and be deducted from the coupons. It is a flexible section that will apply to any future law that may be made upon the subject. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and to say that in very adroit language the gentleman has proposed, and I was surprised that it was not objected to as out of order, to levy a tax, not an income tax, there is not a word about an income tax, but to levy a tax on all bonds.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot stand that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Look and see.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to being interrupted until I have made my statement.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to having misstatements made.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not a misstatement. The proposition of the gentleman reads, "That hereafter there shall be a tax of five per cent. upon any profits, gains, or income arising from bonds." It does not say that the present income tax, with its exemptions and exceptions and deductions, shall be applied to the interest on bonds, but it levies a tax of five per cent., which will be in addition to and independent of the income tax. There is not a word about $1,000 being exempted from the tax, as there is in the income law. The proposition as it stands reported by the Committee on Ways and Means is simply a mode of more certainly collecting the income tax by retaining it at the Treasury, where the citizen will have a right to the exemption if his whole income from all sources is less than $1,000. But if the amendment shall be adopted there will be no exemption whatever, because this tax is levied, not by virtue of the general law which has the exemptions in it, but by virtue of this clause, which levies the tax directly without deduction or exemption or limitation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me a single question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is there any exemption in the tax on bank shares, or in the tax on railroad bonds and canal bonds, let me ask?

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose there is not. What of it? The gentleman has confessed by his question all that I charged upon him. I charged that this which he proposed was not to be in lieu of the income tax, but was to be itself an independent and additional tax, which he at first denied as a misstatement. Now he rises and asks whether I object to it as unjust or not. I was not arguing the justice or injustice of the proposition, but was only arguing that the gentleman was attempting to impose an independent tax and get it adopted under cover of the income tax. I hope his amendment will not be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. I move a substitute for the section reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, which I send up to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter a tax of five per cent. on incomes arising from bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States, except those authorized by this act, payable to any person, State, municipality, body politic or corporate, company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be assessed and collected by the Treasurer or other disbursing officers of the United States charged with paying any interest upon the debt of the United States, in the same currency in which said interest is paid; and said collection shall be made by deduction of the amount of the tax from the coupons or interest due at the time of payment of such interest: Provided, That the sum so deducted from the interest or coupons of any person having a yearly income of less than $1,000 shall be refunded to such person in accordance with rules and regulations to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That this shall be in full for all income tax arising out of said public securities.

Mr. PIKE. The proposition I have made is in exact accordance with the English tax, as claimed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who disagreed with the remarks of mine published in the Globe of the 26th of June last. It is more favorable to the holders of public securities than to the holders of railroad bonds. But it is a provision similar to the English provision in their present law, although I admit that the provision of the former English income law provided that from the interest when it should be paid shall be deducted the income tax; and then if any person having an income less than the prescribed amount shall claim to be refunded, upon substantiating that fact, may be refunded. My proposition is in the interest of the holders of bonds in small quantities. It provides that this tax shall be in full of the ordinary income tax; so that it obviates the objection just made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I offer this amendment because it is in the direct line with the arguments that I have been making in relation to the taxation of these bonds. Although it is in conflict with the report made by the Committee of Ways and Means the other day, in which it was said that no civilized country ever had such a tax as this, and that it would be a gross outrage to have any such tax; still, as the committee have introduced this section, I have only changed it in the particulars I have mentioned.

I hope my amendment will be adopted and received as a peace offering amid the contending elements here, so that we shall no longer have the question mooted in this country of the propriety of the entire practical exemption of some of the best property in the country, at a time when taxation bears so heavily upon the community generally.

Mr. SCHENCK. The questions now presented are, first the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the section originally reported by the Committee of Ways and Means as an amendment to the bill of the Senate, and then the substitute for that section proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] Now, it is highly proper that the House should know precisely what questions are involved in the propositions respectfully submitted to them. There is one decided difference between the propositions submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means and the propositions submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Maine; and that is in relation to the person to whom the tax will extend. Without discussing now the propriety or impropriety of taxing foreign holders of the securities of the United States, persons not citizens of the United States, it is my duty to let the House understand that those persons will not be subject to this tax under the provisions of the section submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means, but will be subject to the tax, with all other bondholders, under each of the other propositions. I will explain. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, instead of providing that "hereafter the tax on any income arising from the bonds and other interest-bearing securities shall be five per cent.," provides that "hereafter there shall be assessed a tax of five per cent. on incomes arising from bonds," &c. Well, sir, there is now a tax of five per cent. on all incomes arising from bonds, except so far as foreigners are concerned. Some gentlemen perhaps have not adverted to the language of our tax law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When he says there is now a tax on bonds does he mean a tax on all bonds, or only where the income is over $1,000?

Mr. SCHENCK. I mean to say there is a tax subject to the exemption applying in all other cases of incomes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. There could be no exemption under your section.

Mr. SCHENCK. The present law provides that "there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rent, interest, dividend, or salary, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a tax of five per cent. on the amount so derived over $1,000," &c.; subject, of course, to the exemptions specified in other provisions. The differences between the propositions of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] and that of the Committee of Ways and Means must, I think, be manifest. It is for the House to decide whether the five per cent. shall be deducted from the coupon or from the amount of the interest whenever paid without regard to the question whether that coupon belongs to a foreigner or not.

I admit that while we adhere to the general provision of law taxing only our own citizens, whether residing at home or abroad, upon their incomes, there does arise a practical difficulty in reference to these coupons if foreigners are to be exempted, because there is a great deal to be apprehended in the way of possibility that every coupon presented under such a law would be claimed to belong to a foreigner. My purpose in rising was to give exact information as to the differences between the propositions now pending. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] was, I think, inadvertent in conceding that there was not in the proposition of the committee this distinction as to the taxation of foreigners.

Mr. ALLISON. I had not examined the provision to which the gentleman has now called attention, and I was mistaken as to its effect. I do not think the present section will apply to foreigners.

Mr. SCHENCK. I say, therefore, that although there may be, perhaps, an implied violation of this principle in the taxation of railroad stocks and other similar interests, yet certainly the general policy of our legislation in regard to tax bills is not to attempt to tax any persons except our own citizens, although we assert the right to tax them whether they reside in this country or abroad.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five" and inserting "one." I think an examination of the section proposed by the committee will show that while it purports to tax Government bonds just as they are taxed at the present time, it is in fact materially different from the provision of the existing law. The present law in imposing an income tax secures to each individual an exemption to the extent of $1,000 of income. Now, I ask whether it is advisable for us in our legislation to make a discrimination against Government securities by providing that every individual who may have $100 or $500 invested in Government securities shall pay a tax of five per cent. on the income from those securities, though his total income may be no more than $100 a year. If a man has his money invested in Government securities, the committee propose that he shall be taxed without regard to his income, while if his money is invested in any other securities he enjoys an exemption to the amount of $1,000.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me every person in the House will see when a coupon is presented to the Treasury it is not known whether it belongs to a man who has an income of $100 or $100,000. Five per cent is deducted. The coupons are sent through the different banks and paid by the Treasury through them. There is no way in which the Treasurers in the different sections of the country can distinguish between those which belong to the man with a large income and those which belong to the poor man. The practical result will be that the man who has only a fifty-dollar bond will be taxed five per cent., when that may be all he has, while another who has an income of $999 will escape taxation. Is this House prepared to take this position? It seems to me the section of the Committee of Ways and Means is subject to this objection. I hope, therefore, the section will not pass.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly the proposition it is to discriminate against the public creditors of the United States and subject all holders of bonds of the United States to taxation without exemptions. I trust the House of Representatives, if it has any purpose at all to legislate in aid of the credit of the United States, will not adopt any legislation which discriminates against the public credit.

I desire to say further, Mr. Chairman, that the past legislation, so far as I am advised, which has been made necessary by reason of this rebellion, has discriminated all the while in favor of the poor and in favor of the producers of this country. I have heard something said here about equal taxation. These gentlemen use the term, I suppose, in its general signification which will put a like tax upon property, real, personal, or mixed, by whomsoever held within our jurisdiction. There has never been any such taxation as that in the United States, and I trust there never will be. Your Congress never taxed the plow in the furrow; your Congress never taxed the hammer upon the anvil; your Congress never taxed the shuttle in the loom; your Congress never taxed the grain in the bushel. I trust it never will tax them.

But I come to the discrimination made here. I know of no pressure whatever that will induce me to put the crippled soldier who lost his leg at Gettysburg upon the same level as to taxation as the millionaire. The discrimination heretofore made in the legislation of this country was, in my judgment, a wise discrimination, which imposed five per cent. on incomes exceeding $1,000, exempting those below $1,000; yet by the amendment this is not to obtain in reference to the holder of our bonds, although it may not amount to more than $300. If I were sure it would not work to the injury of the public creditor I believe I should not object to the substitute of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE;] for that is the only difference at last between the substitute offered by the gentleman from Maine and the proposition reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. The proposition reported by the Committee of Ways and Means seems to infer the foreign holder of our bonds is not subject to taxation. My impression is that it is the right of every nationality to subject the holders of its securities, wherever they may be, to some rule of taxation, whether they are citizens or foreigners. That is the only difference between the substitute, so far as I can see, and the proposition of the committee.

Mr. PIKE. I except $1,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly; they both except $1,000. I am glad that it is so, to add a further word by way of caution, that no further income tax shall be chargeable upon the bonds than that which is herein provided.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last word pro forma. I desire to call the attention of the House to this matter for the last time. We are very chary and careful whenever we come to touch the question of taxing bonds, and members say, "Oh, we must not touch the income derived from bonds belonging to the lame soldier who comes down from Gettysburg." But when that lame soldier is employed in the service of the United States at $100 a month, we take five per cent. out of it directly, and nobody whines. Whenever he comes before us standing on one leg at the desk, or with one arm writing for his pittance for his bread as an employé of the Government, then we say you must pay each dollar of tax to be taken from your pay as you receive it.

Now, let us see what the proposition is on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means. It is to tax everybody but foreign bankers or bondholders. The gentleman from Ohio agrees that the foreign bankers or bondholders shall be exempted, and the Committee of Ways and Means also want to exempt the bankers of this country from taxation. They are careful to do that. There is no income arising from banks, and therefore they are ready to report a proposition to collect a tax on income. This proposition from the Committee of Ways and Means—undoubtedly not intended to be so—is a cheat, a snare, and a delusion; I had almost said, meant to be so. I do not, however, say anything about motives; I only say that the same committee who report this tax on incomes but not on the banks, came in the other day and reported that there was no law, human or divine, which would allow a law to be made with such a provision, and within a week they brought in the same provision; the same in substance and effect. The only difference was that one member of the committee says, "This is meant to tax everything;" and another one says, "It is not meant to do so." Now I desire the House to come to a vote and say whether they will agree honestly and fairly to tax the income from the bonds in the hands of every man alike, and not with exemptions in favor of the rich and powerful. But the law now is however poor a soldier may be, if he holds a railroad bond, or a bank share, or a canal bond, or any other corporate bond, he has to have five per cent. taken out of the coupon or the dividend, whether he is a citizen or an alien. Let me read from the act of July, 1866:

"Pay a tax of five per cent. from the amount of such interest or coupons, or dividends or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, or by whatsoever party or person the same may be payable."

Thus our tax law on incomes now includes everybody, whether citizen or alien. You tax every railroad bond, every bank share, every canal share, or bond; you tax every corporate bond in the hands of the crippled soldier, in the hands of the foreigner, in the hands of the widow, in the hands of the orphan. You do it with an iron hand, taking the tax right from the coupon or dividend; but the moment you come to apply the same to the bonds of the United States in the hands of the banker, there is a hue and cry raised, and gentlemen shelter themselves under the widow and orphan.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: is there not some difference in the inducement which led capitalists to subscribe to railroad bonds or railroad stock and that which led them to subscribe to the bonds of the Government when it was in its hour of peril and need?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; there is a difference. I agree that the subscribers for railroad bonds did not expect to get but about ten per cent. profit, but those who subscribed for Government bonds did expect to get and did get sixty per cent. That is the only difference of inducement.

Mr. O'NEILL. One set of banks were created by the State governments and the other created by the Government of the United States when we were in the dark hours of the war—subscribed for because of patriotism.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, the patriotism which waited till the dark hours of 1864 before they subscribed; till the country was compelled to pay them sixty per cent. in gold for the patriotism of these bondholders. I am quite well acquainted with his forty per cent. patriotism, and dear at that.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say that I cannot understand the necessity of all this excitement, but I do understand, and I desire passing to comment upon the fact, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] somehow or other cannot speak of the argument or action of anybody or of any committee of this House without discovering in it some intrigue, some purpose founded upon a bad motive, and he never speaks of the Committee of Ways and Means except in that way. I said once before, and I now repeat, that so far as impeachment of motives is concerned, I scorn it; it is not worth reply, because if we cannot stand before this House and this country without being injured by such wholesale flings as that, when we are in the ordinary exercise of our duties here as members of the House or as members of that committee, our reputations are not worth trying to defend. But, sir, what does the gentleman say? He says that we do not hesitate to let off the foreign banks while we come down upon poor men at home. Nothing was said about foreign banks. We spoke of the foreign holders whoever they may be, poor men or rich men.

Again, he says that the law, as it now stands, does tax these foreigners, and he read from the law in relation to railroads and banks to prove it. Now, sir, according to my understanding of the law there is nothing in that at all. All these are but the details of an income tax law or of the law which provides for a tax upon incomes, which sets out the character of the persons upon whom all these taxes are to be levied, and they are taxes levied "upon the profits, gains, and income of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, dividends, &c., as well as upon every person residing in the United States." The gentleman reads and perverts another section by giving it an application which it has not at all in order to make out his case. I read it:

SEC. 122. And be it further enacted, That any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slack-water company, indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, upon which interest is stipulated to be paid, or coupons representing the interest, or any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money due or payable to its stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens, or aliens, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction, shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per cent. on the amount of all such interest, or coupons, dividends, or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same may be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, &c.

That is, it is not non-resident aliens that are to be taxed, but our people and our corporations from the gains which they derive, although those gains may be derived from that which is paid by non-residents and aliens. The gentleman has been trying to make the House believe that there is written down here in the law because these words are used a provision to tax persons of that description. Now, all that is in the law is that that which is taxable in the possession and ownership of our own citizens and corporations shall be taxed, no matter from whom they derive it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Derive what?

Mr. SCHENCK. Why, derive the profits.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Oh, no; when an alien has a bond he has five per cent. taken off.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; it is not anything about taxation of interest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When they pay the bond, does he not have five per cent. taken off?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is the provision of the law which I have read to the House, and everybody is able to comprehend it. In laying down a general proposition as to who are to be taxed and proceeding to tax them there is a provision that their gains and profits, their dividends, that which they receive upon bonds issued by them, and whatever is payable to them shall first be taxed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to ask what company ever received any dividend on its debts?

Mr. SCHENCK. I say that the language of the law is clear and plain, and every gentleman can judge for himself. The gentleman quotes the law and applies it by his construction in such a way as to make it appear that it is the person who is taxed when the law itself is only speaking of the person whoever he may be, at home or abroad, from whom the gains are derived. That is all I wish to correct.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to move to amend this section so that it shall read:

That hereafter a tax equal to the income tax on other incomes shall be assessed on the interest arising from the bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States, payable to any person whatever, either foreigner, citizen, or alien, &c.

Now, I do not desire to enter into any wrangling discussion about motives or anything of that kind, but I desire to make myself understood, if I can. I say now that so far as this section is concerned I have not understood it, nor do I yet understand it, as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] seems to understand it. I did not intend to be understood, nor do I now intend to be understood, as being in favor of exempting foreign bondholders from paying a tax on the interest from their bonds. Then I propose, if this section shall mean what the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says it means, to amend it so as to provide that all interest on bonds shall be taxable, no matter in whose hands those bonds may be.

My proposition is and has been all the time to tax all bonds except those provided for by this bill, so that we may secure the exchange of our outstanding bonds for the issue herein provided for. If we expect to secure an exchange of those bonds, we can do it by no other means save that of taxing the bonds sufficiently to induce holders to exchange them. And if we tax them, then let the tax be equal upon the citizen of the country and the foreigner. The foreigner is as much bound to pay a tax upon the interest derived from our bonds as our citizens are. Now, I say for the purpose of correcting an impression that may be upon the minds of some gentlemen here, that this thing of alluding all the time to the soldier and the sailor is sheer nonsense. This is a mere question of taxation; and the tax should fall equally upon all, whether soldier or sailor, citizen or foreigner, if we expect to do justice to the Government and to the people.

We here to-day are taxed upon our salaries. Every time one of us draws his pay the Sergeant-at-Arms deducts the five per cent. tax. It has been said here during the discussion that the soldier was not taxed unless his income is $1,000. I beg leave to correct that impression if it exists here. Every man in the Army who received a compensation from the Government, no matter what his income was, had five per cent. deducted when the paymaster paid him. He did not, as other men did, have $1,000 of his income exempted from the tax. And I say to those who refer here to the soldier and sailor, that they were the very persons you dealt unfairly with in your income law, because you taxed their entire income, no matter how small or how great it was, while all others were allowed an exemption of $1,000.

Mr. BENTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BENTON. The remark of the gentleman is calculated to produce the impression that the common soldier paid an income tax.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. BENTON. The gentleman said the soldier had five per cent. deducted from his pay by the paymaster as a tax.

Mr. LOGAN. The officer is a soldier.

Mr. BENTON. That was a tax upon his office.

Mr. LOGAN. Any one who held an office in the Army, no matter if it was only the office of first lieutenant, although he bared his breast to the steel of the enemy, was taxed; and the gentleman says he was taxed because he held an office.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. Did the law except that class of individuals from all others, so far as the income tax was concerned?

Mr. LOGAN. I say that the law taxed them five per cent. on their salaries, whether small or large.

Mr. HIGBY. Were they taxed differently from everybody else?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; everybody else was exempted on his income to the amount of $1,000.

Mr. HIGBY. Except the soldier?

Mr. LOGAN. There was no exception in terms; but the salary of the soldier was counted by law as income. There was no exemption whatever; and the tax was paid on the whole of it.

Mr. HIGBY. That was for want of a proper rule.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in rising is to correct gentlemen in regard to what, with due deference to others, I think is a mistake about the existing law. Every man who is taxed five per cent. upon his salary, whether he be an officer of the Army or a member of Congress, gets his exemption to the amount of $1,000. Salaries are regarded as income, and the only difference between them and other incomes is that persons receiving salaries from the Government do not get the benefit of the deductions allowed to others paying a tax on income. They are allowed the exemption of $1,000; but from the amount that remains there is no deduction for house rent, for lost debts, for destruction of property by fire, &c. The same disadvantage would be experienced in deducting a tax from the coupon upon the spot, and we have been willing that those paying income tax deducted from coupons shall be put upon the same footing as those now paying tax upon salaries received from the Government. I did not suppose there could be any doubt about this point. I cannot at this moment turn to the language of the law in relation to salaries, but I am sure it is explicit. Gentlemen are mistaken in saying that those who receive salaries from the Government have not the benefit of any exemption. A member of Congress, as well as every other public officer, gets the benefit of the exemption of $1,000, only the surplus being taxed, but the difference is that upon this surplus a public officer or an employé of the Government does not get the benefit of deductions for house rent, losses, &c. A clerk receiving from the Government a salary of $1,200 is taxed five per cent. upon $200, $1,000 being deducted. So with an officer of the Army. But either of these may pay four or five hundred dollars for house rent; he may suffer during the year losses from bad debts and otherwise, for which a deduction is allowed to those receiving income from other sources; yet he does not get the benefit of those deductions, but pays his tax, although, in fact, he may all the while have been going behind hand.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman has spoken of the exemption of officers' salaries to the amount of $1,000. He will allow me to make a correction of my former statement. I was mistaken in saying that there was no exemption allowed to officers of the Army. According to the law in force during the war, there was an exemption of $600; but all the salaries then amounted to over $600.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have now before me the provision of the existing law, and it agrees with the statement I have already made. The language is—

"That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all salaries of officers or payments for services to persons in the civil, military, naval, or other employment or service of the United States, including Senators and Representatives and Delegates in Congress, when exceeding the rate of $1,000 per annum, a tax of five per cent. on the excess above said $1,000."

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew the amendment to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, when this section was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, I supposed that it applied to the incomes from all bonds and securities of the United States, wherever they might be held; and I am not yet clear that that is not the correct construction of the section without any amendment. Hence, so far as any intrigue may be charged upon the Committee of Ways and Means, that charge certainly does not apply to me. If the section is not perfect it is because of an inadvertence on the part of some member of the committee in not making it perfect. And I will say, Mr. Chairman, that in drawing the section we followed substantially the language of another section introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] a day or two ago, except that we do not make the unjust discrimination which he then proposed, but which he now abandons, having either discovered that we have not the constitutional power to make the discrimination, or, having the power, that it would be bad policy to exercise it.

Now, sir, so far as I am personally concerned, if a deduction of five per cent. is to be made at the Treasury from the interest of any of these bonds, I am in favor of extending that deduction to all the bonds of the United States, and I must beg to differ with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means as to the construction of the present law so far as regards the stock of railroad companies held out of the United States. It was the intention of Congress, in passing the law of June 13, 1866, to make that provision apply to all the bonds and stock of railroad companies or other corporations. That was the intention of the Congress of the United States. It has been so interpreted by the revenue department, and if I am not mistaken the Chief Justice of the United States has so decided in a case in Baltimore. I tried to find the decision this morning, but was unable to do so, and I state the substance of it from recollection only. He declared that we had the right to pass such a law. The question arose in the circuit court of Maryland on this provision, the amount of the tax having been deducted from the interest on the coupons. I think I cannot be mistaken when I state that such decision in substance, at least, has been made by the Chief Justice.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If my colleague will allow me, I think the Chief Justice decided the reverse of what he states, and hence the amendment in the law passed July 13, 1866.

Mr. ALLISON. I allude to a different decision, one made since the law of July 13, 1866, and made under the provisions of that act. I am not mistaken when I state that the interpretation I now give is the one accepted and acted upon by the executive and judicial departments of the Government, and acquiesced in by the various corporations affected by its provisions. If that law is just in its provisions I can see no objection to the provision under consideration. In my judgment there is no reason why a different rule should be applied to the holders of United States bonds than is applied to holders of railroad bonds, or bonds of other corporations. This is not a tax upon bonds; it is a tax upon incomes, and does not change the existing law upon that subject, except that it makes a different rule for the collection of the income tax derived from this source, bringing the income tax from this source within the provisions of the act of July 13, 1866, as I have before stated. The United States never has surrendered the right to tax incomes from whatever source they may be derived. And from the beginning of our legislation upon the income tax we have assessed a tax upon the incomes derived from interest upon United States bonds, and we do not propose to levy a different or other tax than that imposed by law now. If the tax is to be deducted at the Treasury it will be impossible to ascertain when the bonds are held, or who may be the owner of the coupon presented, or at least it will be impracticable to make any rule by which the ownership can be definitely ascertained. It seems to me that we must either abandon this method of collection or make it applicable to all coupons presented at the Treasury.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to strike out the last word, and I desire the substitute of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] may be reported, so the question may be understood.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter a tax of five per cent. on income arising from bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States, except those authorized by this act, payable to any person, State, municipality, body politic, or corporate company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be assessed and collected by the Treasurer or other disbursing officers of the United States charged with paying any interest upon the debt of the United States, in the same currency in which said interest is paid, and such collection shall be made by deduction of the amount of the tax from the coupons or interest due at the time of payment of such interest: Provided, That the sum so deducted from the interest or coupons of any person having a yearly income of less than $1,000 shall be refunded to such person in accordance with rules and regulations to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That this shall be in full for all income tax arising out of said public securities.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire the committee to consider what I said before, that the substitute of the gentleman from Maine differs in nowise from the section reported by the Committee of Ways and Means except in that it does provide the holder of the securities of the United States, whether domestic or foreign, shall be subjected to an equal tax. Now, I desire to say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that the position I assume about this matter cannot be snuffed out by any remark about a skyrocket. The great body of landed proprietors of this country do not pay one dollar tax. After deducting costs, expenses, and exemptions there is no income left to tax. The result of the operation of the law is that the great body of landed proprietors do not pay one dollar income tax, although they hold half the fee-simple of the continent. The law is based on the American policy to encourage the productive industry of the nation, from which this provision proposes no departure, neither does that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, nor that proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. So far gentlemen on all sides are agreed as to the general policy.

Then as to the exemption. I said before, and I repeat now, that when you exempted $600 the exemption included every soldier, whether officer or private in the ranks; and when you exempted $1,000 you exempted the income of the members of this House and of every other official in this country. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to cut off the exemption as to holder of bonds, and thereby discriminate against the public creditor. And further, it is a double tax upon him. It subjects him to an income tax of five per cent. and then an additional five per cent. on his gains, whatever they may be. There is nothing said in his proposition about income tax.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Incomes, gains, or profits.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir; incomes, gains, or profits. If the gentleman means only to tax five per cent. on the income, why does he not say so? If that is all he means, what is the objection to the substitute of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have not any.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, then, we are agreed, and I am glad we are agreed for once. I have come to the conclusion that it is competent for the Government of the United States to tax its securities by whomsoever held, whether at home or abroad, provided the Government shall subject non-resident and alien holders to the same rule as is applied to citizens of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOAN. I take the floor for the purpose of asking a question or two of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. First, I desire to know if he believes that Congress can confer authority upon the States to tax the public securities of the Government?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no doubt on that question. I think Congress can confer no such power to tax them.

Mr. LOAN. Then they are exempt from taxation by State authority.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not say that I understood that applies to the tax by the United States itself upon the income from its bonds.

Mr. LOAN. That is the next question: whether the United States can tax its own securities?

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe that to be a mere question of expediency. I think the United States Government can do it if it is willing to go into the market and borrow money with the understanding declared upon its statute-book that the very interest which it contracts to pay it will take back again in the way of taxes.

Mr. LOAN. That is the point I wish to get at, whether the Federal Government has authority to tax these securities in the hands of holders. If that is the case, I would like to ask this further question, What is the limit of that right of taxation? Is it not possible to tax the bonds out of existence?

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose this Government could tax them to the whole extent of the interest, or more, could tax them out of existence. I hold that there is no constitutional power to give to the States, and no propriety in giving to the States under the Constitution a control over that question to overthrow the credit of the General Government. But if the General Government itself shall be mad enough to tax its own credit out of existence it has the power to do it.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to put a question to the gentleman from Missouri. This way of putting questions and making speeches against the bill is a very good way to get off jokes in the House. There is a great deal of talk about taxing bonds in the holders' hands. I would like to be informed how many bonds the gentleman from Missouri supposes, originally issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, are now in the hands of those who contracted for them? I have got some, but I never contracted with the Government for them.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. LOAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the gentleman from Missouri to assert that we propose by this bill to tax the bonds of the United States? Is that his understanding?

Mr. LOAN. That is my understanding.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not my understanding.

Mr. LOAN. It is disguised, it is true.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no disguise about it. We tax the man who receives an income from bonds of the United States the same amount that we tax the man who receives an income from tilling the soil or working in the manufactures of the country. It is a tax on the individual, not on the bonds or on the interest, but on his income, and nothing less and nothing more.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe there is nothing before the committee, and I desire to present something. I propose to amend the original section before the vote is taken on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not now in order, as there is an amendment pending.

Mr. PAINE. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] I do not desire to make any remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The formal amendments heretofore offered will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend the substitute of the gentleman from Maine, by striking out the word "hereafter," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "at the expiration of one year from and after the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the section reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw that amendment, being satisfied with the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the section reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, by adding to it the following:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe regulations for the purpose of determining in each case who is the actual owner of the coupon presented for payment or of the interest demanded, and whether any exemption to which such owner may be entitled has been already allowed or is to be deducted.

When this matter first came up I did not, nor to this moment have I indicated any feeling on the subject whether foreigners shall be taxed or not, nor had I said anything on that subject when the storm was raised. I did feel it my duty when the question was raised, and there seemed to be, as I thought, a misapprehension even among some members of my own committee, to call attention to the fact that there was a difference between the proposition made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] and the proposition made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the section as drafted by the Committee of Ways and Means in its application to foreigners, and that I explained by referring to the existing income tax law. And why? Because the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means does not undertake to levy the tax; it does not undertake to establish any system of taxation, but simply provides a mode for the collection of a particular kind of income tax. And, therefore, the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, not seeking to put a tax section into a bill which has nothing to do with taxes, provides only that hereafter the tax on any income arising from bonds shall be collected in a particular way. That led us back of course to see what income did arise, and looking at the income law every gentleman could see that under the existing law this tax upon income is levied upon residents or upon citizens residing abroad. That is the whole of it.

Now, sir, I am willing to submit to this House whether we ought to adhere to our existing policy, taxing income only as we have taxed it heretofore—that of residents or citizens residing abroad—or whether we shall extend it to these foreigners, so far as their bonds are concerned. It is proper that the committee should understand the difference. I admit, as this section was drafted, that it does not apply to foreigners, but only to persons residing here and citizens residing abroad. I have therefore prepared an amendment to this section, so that, if it shall ultimately prevail, it may not be defective in the respect in which I admit it is now defective.

This leaves open the question how you are to ascertain, when a coupon is presented or interest is demanded upon a bond, whether the person holding the coupon or demanding the interest is one liable to taxation, and it leaves open the question to be ascertained whether a person has or has not already had the benefit of the exemption. I shall therefore move to add to the section a provision that the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe regulations by which to ascertain, in every case where a coupon is presented for payment or interest is demanded upon a bond, whether the person who is the actual owner is or is not, under the existing law, and under this section, one to be taxed, and also that he shall prescribe regulations to ascertain whether he has or has not had his exemption. I think that amendment is necessary in order to perfect the section reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, whether it shall ultimately prevail or not. I hope the committee will agree to amend the section in that way, so that, if the substitute for it moved by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] should not be adopted, it will not then be defective in the particular in which I admit it is now defective.

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am now willing that the vote shall be taken upon the substitute.

Mr. PIKE. If the committee will listen to me, I desire to say one word upon the substitute, because the question is now between my substitute and the section as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I ask that my substitute may be read, so that what I say may be understood.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter a tax of five per cent. on income arising from bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States, except those authorized by this act, payable to any person, State, municipality, body politic or corporate company, or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be assessed and collected by the Treasurer or other disbursing officers of the United States charged with paying any interest upon the debt of the United States in the same currency in which said interest is paid; and such collection shall be made by deduction of the amount of the tax from the coupons or interest due at the time of payment of such interest: Provided, That the sum so deducted from the interest or coupons, if any person having a yearly income of less than $1,000, shall be refunded to such person in accordance with rules and regulations to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury;

And provided further, That this shall be in full for all income taxes arising out of said public securities.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the amendments now pending.

Mr. PIKE. Then I move to strike out the last word of my substitute for the purpose of making some remarks. The question now before the committee is practically between the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, as explained by the chairman, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and the substitute therefor which I have submitted. The difference is in relation to the taxation of foreigners. The proposition I submit makes no distinction between residents and foreigners, so far as this tax is concerned. The proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means makes a distinction; it proposes to tax residents, but not to tax foreigners. Upon that subject I have this to say: I have examined with great care Sir Robert Peel's law of 1842; and I have examined with equal care Mr. Gladstone's law of 1853. I have here a resumé of both those income laws, and from end to end of either of those laws there is no exemption of foreigners. There are five exemptions in the English law. But the only foreigner exempted from the tax is the minister resident of a foreign Power. If he owns any British bonds he is exempted from taxation. But everybody else is liable to taxation under that law. I have in this substitute followed the English law in that particular, and also in another particular; and that is this: the English rule is to collect the tax at the bank of everybody when the coupon or the interest is paid. If anybody comes within the exemption he is refunded the amount; but the collection is first made, and then refunded.

Now, I have provided that the Secretary of the Treasury may make regulations for that purpose. The object of the proposition is apparent (that we shall not for the payment of the tax trust simply to the consciences of persons holding these bonds, but that the payment shall be made first, and then any man coming within the exemption may show it by some simple means and have the amount of the tax repaid to him).

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether during the entire war it was not the constant policy of the Government to avoid negotiating a foreign loan; whether it is not a fact that we did not negotiate any such loan, and whether all bonds held by foreigners are not now in second hands, the present holders having taken them subject to the same burdens and responsibilities to which they were subject in the hands of the original holders.

Mr. PIKE. That is quite true, and I will state another fact, that the proposition was repeatedly submitted to this House to make our bonds payable in London and Frankfurt, and the House always refused to assent to any such proposition.

Mr. MAYNARD. The point of my inquiry is this: whether the foreign holder of our bonds stands in any better attitude, is protected by any higher equity than any of our own citizens who may hold these bonds?

Mr. PIKE. Not a particle. The House will bear in mind, also, that more than one half the bonded debt of this country has been taken since Lee surrendered at Appomattox Court-House; and nine tenths of that debt—yes, more than nine tenths of it—has been taken since the rebellion was virtually overcome at Gettysburg and at Vicksburg.

Mr. LOGAN. I like very much the substitute of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] but I would suggest to him that its language may be made more explicit by inserting after the word "person" the words "whatever, either citizen, alien, or foreigner."

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and myself, in drawing this language originally, followed the phraseology of the English law.

Mr. LOGAN. The words I suggest will not do any harm, and will make the provision more explicit, so that the people of the country may have no difficulty in understanding its object.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine the propriety of striking out "securities" and inserting "obligations," making the phrase read "interest-bearing obligations of the United States."

Mr. PIKE. I have no objection to that. I modify my amendment by striking out the word "securities" and inserting in its place the word "obligations."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENTON. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] maintains that, so far as this question is concerned, there should be no distinction between our own citizen and the foreign bondholder. Now, sir, as regards myself, if honorably and without exceeding our legal authority we can tax the foreigner I should be glad to make him assist in paying off our debt. But, sir, to my mind there appears to be a wide distinction between the position of our own citizen, who is in duty bound to contribute to the maintenance and support of this Government, and the position of the foreigner who merely holds the evidence of the indebtedness of the Government. I think there is a wide distinction between the taxation imposed on railroad corporations, steamboat companies, &c., whose property is within the limits of the United States, and the taxation of the mere naked obligations of the Government. The Government has issued its obligations to pay a certain amount of money and a certain rate of interest; and now it is maintained by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and other gentlemen, that we can turn round and say to the foreign creditor, (this is the plain English of it,) "We will pay you a portion of the interest, but another portion we will deduct and call it taxes." Gentlemen think they are going to make a good deal of popularity out of such propositions; but if I am not greatly mistaken, the high sense of honor which has always distinguished the American nation will never countenance any such picayune repudiation. If I believed that we have the right to tax the foreign creditor I would vote to tax him; but I do not believe any such thing. I believe it is true now, as it was when it was first declared in the infancy of this nation, that taxation and representation should ever be regarded as inseparable. Some gentlemen may attempt to make capital out of propositions such as that now before us; but I would not, for the sake of saving to the Government tens or hundreds or thousands of millions, sacrifice the honor, the integrity, the high standing of this Government before the nations of the world. I believe every single cent we gain by sacrificing our national honor we lose immensely, immeasurably. I do not believe in any demagogical scheme. I believe in equal, just, and impartial taxation as far as we can. I do not believe in any repudiating schemes.

Mr. LOGAN. I have heard this charge of repudiation very often in this House by gentlemen who perhaps understand it, and perhaps they do not. Does the gentleman consider taxation repudiation?

Mr. BENTON. Not at all. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question. What right has the gentleman to tax foreigners to support our Government?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the House to agree to stop the debate on this section. If I cannot get unanimous consent I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the special order under consideration, being Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States in answer to a resolution of the House, transmitting documents in reference to the treaty with the Great and Little Osage Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Experience has fully demonstrated the wisdom of the framers of the Federal Constitution. Under all circumstances the result of their labors was as near an approximation to perfection as was compatible with the fallibility of man. Such being the estimation in which the Constitution is and has ever been held by our countrymen, it is not surprising that any proposition for its alteration or amendment should be received with reluctance and distrust. While this sentiment deserves commendation and encouragement as a useful preventive of unnecessary attempt to change its provisions, it must be conceded that time has developed imperfections and omissions in the Constitution the reformation of which has been demanded by the best interests of the country. Some of these have been remedied in the manner provided in the Constitution itself. There are others which, although heretofore brought to the attention of the people, have never been so presented as to enable the popular judgment to determine whether they should be corrected by means of additional amendments. My object in this communication is to suggest certain defects in the Constitution which seem to me to require correction, and to recommend that the judgment of the people be taken on the amendments proposed.

The first of the defects to which I desire to direct attention is in that clause of the Constitution which provides for the election of President and Vice President through the intervention of electors, and not by an immediate vote of the people. The importance of so amending this clause as to secure to the people the election of President and Vice President by their direct votes was urged with great earnestness and ability by President Jackson in his first annual message, and the recommendation was repeated in five of his subsequent communications to Congress, extending through the eight years of his administration. In his message of 1829 he said:

"To the people belongs the right of electing their Chief Magistrate; it was never designed that their choice should in any case be defeated, either by the intervention of Electoral Colleges or by the agency confided, under certain contingencies, to the House of Representatives."

He then proceeded to state the objections to an election of President by the House of Representatives, the most important of which was that the choice of a clear majority of the people might be easily defeated. He then closed the argument with the following communication:

"I would therefore recommend such an amendment to the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of President and Vice President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election; and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for by confining the second to a choice between the two highest candidates. In connection with such an amendment it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either four or six years. If, however, it should not be adopted it is worthy of consideration whether a provision disqualifying for office the Representatives in Congress on whom such an election may have devolved would not be proper."

Although this recommendation was repeated with undiminished earnestness in several of his succeeding messages, yet the proposed amendment was never adopted and submitted to the people by Congress. The danger of a defeat of the people's choice in an election by the House of Representatives remains unprovided for in the Constitution, and would be greatly increased if the House of Representatives should assume the power arbitrarily to reject the votes of a State which might not be cast in conformity with the wishes of the majority in that body.

But if President Jackson failed to secure the amendment to the Constitution which he urged so persistently, his arguments contributed largely to the formation of party organizations, which have effectually avoided the contingency of an election by the House of Representatives. These organizations, first by a resort to the caucus system of nominating candidates, and afterward to State and national conventions, have been successful in so limiting the number of candidates as to escape the danger of an election by the House of Representatives.

It is clear, however, that in thus limiting the number of candidates the true object and spirit of the Constitution have been evaded and defeated. It is an essential feature in our republican system of government that every citizen possessing the constitutional qualifications has a right to become a candidate for the office of President or Vice President, and that every qualified elector has a right to cast his vote for any citizen whom he may regard as worthy of these offices. But under the party organizations which have prevailed for years, these asserted rights of the people have been as effectually cut off and destroyed as if the Constitution itself had inhibited their exercise.

The danger of a defeat of the popular choice in an election by the House of Representatives is no greater than in an election made nominally by the people themselves, when by the laws of party organizations and by the constitutional provisions requiring the people to vote for electors instead of for the President or Vice President, it is made impracticable for any citizen to be a candidate except through the process of a party nomination, and for any voter to cast his suffrage for any other person than one thus brought forward through the manipulations of a nominating convention. It is thus apparent that by means of party organizations that provision of the Constitution which requires the election of President and Vice President to be made through the Electoral Colleges has been made instrumental and potential in defeating the great object of conferring the choice of these officers upon the people. It may be conceded that party organizations are inseparable from republican government, and that, when formed and managed in subordination to the Constitution, they may be valuable safeguards of popular liberty; but when they are perverted to purposes of bad ambition they are liable to become the dangerous instruments of overthrowing the Constitution itself. Strongly impressed with the truth of these views, I feel called upon by an imperative sense of duty to revive substantially the recommendation so often and so earnestly made by President Jackson, and to urge that the amendment to the Constitution herewith presented, or some similar proposition, may be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection.

Recent events have shown the necessity of an amendment to the Constitution distinctly defining the persons who shall discharge the duties of President of the United States in the event of a vacancy in that office by the death, resignation, or removal of both the President and Vice President. It is clear that this should be fixed by the Constitution, and not be left to repeable enactments of doubtful constitutionality. It occurs to me that in the event of a vacancy in the office of President, by the death, resignation, disability, or removal of both the President and Vice President, the duties of the office should devolve upon an officer of the executive department of the Government, rather than one connected with the legislative or judicial departments. The objections to designating either the President pro tempore of the Senate or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, especially in the event of a vacancy produced by removal, are so obvious and so unanswerable that they need not be stated in detail. It is enough to state that they are both interested in producing a vacancy, and, according to the provisions of the Constitution, are members of the tribunal by whose decree a vacancy may be produced.

Under such circumstances the impropriety of designating either of these officers to succeed the President so removed is palpable. The framers of the Constitution, when they referred to Congress the settlement of the succession to the office of President, in the event of a vacancy in the offices of both President and Vice President, did not, in my opinion, contemplate the designation of any other than an officer of the executive department on whom, in such a contingency, the powers and duties of the President should devolve. Until recently the contingency has been remote, and serious attention has not been called to the manifest incongruity between the provisions of the Constitution on this subject and the act of Congress of 1792. Having, however, been brought almost face to face with this important question, it seems an eminently proper time for us to make the legislation conform to the language, intent, and theory of the Constitution, and thus place the executive department beyond the reach of usurpation, and remove from the legislative and judicial departments every temptation to combine for the absorption of all the powers of Government.

It has occurred to me that in the event of such a vacancy the duties of President would devolve most appropriately upon some one of the heads of the several Executive Departments; and, under this conviction, I present for your consideration an amendment to the Constitution on this subject, with the recommendation that it be submitted to the people for their action.

Experience seems to have established the necessity of an amendment of that clause of the Constitution which provides for the election of Senators to Congress by the Legislatures of the several States. It would be more consistent with the genius of our form of government if the Senators were chosen directly by the people of the several States. The objections to the election of Senators by the Legislatures are so palpable that I deem it unnecessary to do more than submit the proposition for such an amendment, with the recommendation that it be opened to the people for their judgment.

It is strongly impressed on my mind that the tenure of office by the judiciary of the United States during good behavior for life is incompatible with the spirit of republican government, and in this opinion I am fully sustained by the evidence of popular judgment upon this subject in the different States of the Union.

I therefore deem it my duty to recommend an amendment to the Constitution by which the terms of the judicial officers would be limited to a period of years, and I herewith present it in the hope that Congress will submit it to the people for their decision.

The foregoing views have long been entertained by me. In 1845, in the House of Representatives, and afterward, in 1860, in the Senate of the United States, I submitted substantially the same propositions as those to which the attention of Congress is herein invited. Time, observation, and experience have confirmed these convictions; and, as a matter of public duty and a deep sense of my constitutional obligation, "to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as I deem necessary and expedient," I submit the accompanying propositions, and urge their adoption and submission to the judgment of the people.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 18, 1868.

Joint resolution proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Whereas the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States provides for amendments thereto, in the manner following, namely:

1. Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution, or on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by convention in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution; that hereafter the President and Vice President of the United States shall be chosen for the term of six years by the people of the respective States, in the manner following: Each State shall be divided by the Legislatures thereof into districts equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress of the United States; the said districts to be composed of contiguous territory, and to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled to be represented under the Constitution, and to be laid off, for the first time, immediately after the ratification of this amendment; that, on the first Thursday in August, in the year 18—, and on the same day, every sixth year thereafter, the citizens of each State who possess the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures shall meet within their respective districts and vote for a President and Vice President of the United States; and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President, and the one receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President in each district, shall be held to have received one vote; which fact shall be immediately certified by the Governor of the State to each of the Senators in Congress from such State, and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Congress of the United States shall be in session on the second Monday in October, in the year 18—, and on the same day on every sixth year thereafter; and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given; but if no person have such majority, then a second election shall be held on the first Thursday in the month of December then next ensuing, between the persons having the two highest numbers for the office of President, which second election shall be conducted, the result certified, and the votes counted, in the same manner as in the first, and the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President. But if two or more persons shall have received the greatest, and an equal number of votes at the second election, then the person who shall have received the greatest number of votes in the greatest number of States shall be President. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President at the first election, shall be Vice President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given; and if no person have such a majority, then a second election shall take place between the persons having the two highest numbers, on the same day that the second election is held for President; and the person having the highest number of votes for Vice President shall be Vice President. But if there should happen to be an equality of votes between the persons so voted for at the second election, then the person having the greatest number of States shall be Vice President. But when a second election shall be necessary in the case of Vice President, and not necessary in the case of President, then the Senate shall choose a Vice President from the persons having the two highest numbers in the first election, as is now prescribed by the Constitution: Provided, That after the ratification of this amendment to the Constitution, the President and Vice President shall hold their offices, respectively, for the term of six years, and that no President or Vice President shall be eligible for reelection to a second term.

And be it further resolved, That article two, section one, paragraph six, of the Constitution of the United States shall be amended so as to read as follows: In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, or resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President, and in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice President, the powers and duties of said office shall devolve upon the Secretary of State for the time being, and after this officer, in case of vacancy in that or in other Departments, and in the order in which they are named, on the Secretary of the Treasury, on the Secretary of War, on the Secretary of the Navy, on the Secretary of the Interior, on the Postmaster General, and on the Attorney General; and such officer on whom the powers and duties of President shall devolve, in accordance with the foregoing provisions, shall then act as President until the disability shall be removed, or a President shall be elected, as is or may be provided for by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That article one, section three, be amended to read as follows: The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the persons qualified to vote for the members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

SEC. 4. And be it further resolved, That article three, section one, be amended to read as follows:

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress from time to time may ordain and establish. The judges of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during the terms of twelve years, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. And it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twelve months after the ratification of this amendment by three fourths of all the States, as provided by the Constitution of the United States, to divide the whole number of judges, as near as may be practicable, into three classes. The seats of the judges of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the fourth year from such classification, of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the twelfth year, so that one third may be chosen every fourth year thereafter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of contracts made by the quartermaster's department during the month of June, 1863; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be now suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order. Pending that motion, I move that all further debate in committee be closed in five minutes. The motion was agreed to.

The rules were then accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.)

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition now pending is one of the most serious that has even been considered by this House since I have been a member. It is a proposition to change the long established policy of the Government in regard to its securities and the scope of its taxation. So far as I can learn it was never before proposed to tax securities of the United States when held in the hands of foreigners. I do not say that we have no right to impose such a tax, especially in case of bonds that were not negotiated abroad with interest payable abroad. I recognize a great difference between the legal constitutional status of a bond sold here, and its interest payable here, which may be purchased from a citizen by a foreigner, and a bond issued for a foreign loan bought from the Government by foreigners and the principal and interest made payable abroad. In the latter case it is evident that we would have no legal or equitable right to tax the foreign holder. In the former case I cannot speak with the same certainty, and I will not now go further into the question of our right to tax them than to say I seriously doubt it. I will consider only the policy of such a course. Two debtor nations have undertaken to do this thing, or something quite similar to this within the last few months. They are the kingdoms of Austria and Italy. Both have levied exceptional taxes on the interest of their bonds. The consequence is that the leading exchange boards of Europe are threatening to throw their bonds out of their markets, and both Austria and Italy have suffered measureless injury in their credit and honor.

Within the last two weeks the Prime Minister of Austria has published letters of explanation and apology for the remarkable conduct of the Reichsrath, and that apology is a confession that Austria, humbled by adverse war, overwhelmed by a rapidly increasing deficit, had reached the verge of bankruptcy, and inexorable necessity has compelled her to adopt a measure which she could only lament but could not defend. The history of the Italian law is of the same character. When the proposition was first offered in the Legislature in March last, the leading members left the Chamber and broke up a quorum, declaring that the discussion of such a measure was dishonor. But necessity has at last compelled the Government to adopt it. I am aware that the pending section is unlike the measures to which I have just referred in this, that it does not levy an exceptional tax on the interest of our bonds, but only subjects the foreigner to the operation of our income tax law. But just at this point I desire to offer this thought for the consideration of the House. Suppose the proposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] should be adopted, will all the provisions of the income law apply to the foreign holder of our bonds? Will the $1,000 exemption apply? An American citizen, if he holds bonds, will be entitled to repayment of all the interest withheld from his coupons by the Treasury Department provided his income from all sources does not amount to $1,000. I want to know how it will be with the foreign holder. Will the $1,000 exemption apply to him also? If so, to what part of his income will the exemption apply? To all his income from all sources; to that arising in England, in France, in Germany, or anywhere? Or will the exemption apply only to that part of his income arising in the United States? If the exemption does not apply to the foreign holder the tax is not an income tax in his case, but is an exceptional tax on the interest of the bonds. If the exemption does apply to him you are involved in many intricate questions as to the mode of administering the law. I ask the House to consider that if this should become a law it will involve us in very many and very great difficulties.

Now, in the moment which is left me I desire to call attention to another consideration: can this country, which has now $600,000,000 of its bonds abroad, at the very moment its Congress is attempting by law to provide for funding $2,100,000,000 more—one of the propositions now pending is that a large share of these bonds shall be made into a foreign loan, and negotiated and paid abroad—can this country afford, as a debtor nation, to place itself even by remote analogy alongside of two bankrupt kingdoms of the Old World, whose honor has been stained and whose credit has been ruined by legislation to which this bears a close resemblance? I grant that their tax is exceptional and exorbitant, as this is not; but yet this is a step in that direction; it is a new measure in our history; a measure not recommended by any committee of this House, not recommended in the bill that came from the Senate, a measure which has never been deliberated upon, but which is sprung upon us in the heat of debate, in the closing hours of a heated term, and will be judged by the light or darkness of several other measures which have been agitated in this House. I hope the House will think carefully and act deliberately. For myself, I desire to say before closing that I do not now wish to commit my judgment on all the aspects of this case, but that I may be free hereafter to adopt whatever opinions a careful consideration of it may lead me to entertain. I cannot vote for this amendment, and I hope the House will reject it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Paine] to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

The amendment of Mr. Paine was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. PIKE; and being put, there were—ayes 17, noes 63.

Mr. ROSS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PIKE and GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 73.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to add the section; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no association authorized and organized for banking purposes under the provisions of the act to provide a national currency, secured by the pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, approved June 3, 1864, or any act amendatory thereto, deposit, transfer, or deliver to the Treasurer of the United States as security to entitle any such association to engage in the business of banking any other bond of the United States than such as are authorized to be issued under the first section of this act.

The question was put, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to offer for sale the bonds herein authorized only through the proper officers of his Department, and at a rate not less than par. And the proceeds of the sales of all such bonds shall be reserved for and applied to the purchase and extinguishment of the present coin interest-bearing debt of the United States.

The question was put, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That on and after the passage of this act all authority under any existing law to issue bonds or interest-bearing Treasury notes or obligations of the United States shall cease and determine: Provided, Nothing herein shall prevent the conversion of Treasury notes known as seven-thirtieths into five-twentieths; nor the issue of the three per cent. certificates of temporary loans; nor the exchange of registered bonds for coupon bonds; nor the issue as subsidies to railroad companies as provided by law.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. That after the passage of this act no association which shall be authorized and organized for banking purposes under the provisions of the act to provide a national currency secured by the pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, approved June 3, 1864, or any act amendatory thereto, deposit, transfer, or deliver to the Treasurer of the United States as security to entitle any such association to engage in the business of banking any other bonds of the United States than such as are authorized to be issued under the first section of this act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer as a substitute for that amendment two sections, which I send to the Clerk's desk, providing for the same thing and for free banking hereafter so that the West can have some currency.

The Clerk read the substitute as follows:

SEC. —. Be it further enacted, That on or before the 1st of January, 1869, all banking associations organized under the act approved June 3, 1864, and the acts supplemental thereto or amendatory thereof, shall exchange, as by this act provided, all the registered United States bonds by them now deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, as in the aforementioned acts required, for the bonds authorized by this act; and thereafter all deposits of United States bonds now by law required to be made by banking associations with the Treasurer of the United States, shall be of the bonds authorized by this act and none other, and if any banking association shall fail to make the exchange above specified by the date mentioned, the Comptroller of the currency shall forthwith proceed to wind up the affairs of such association in the manner now by law provided.

SEC. —. Be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of January, 1869, all restriction on the amount of national bank note currency to be issued shall cease, and any association complying with the requirements of said act of June 3, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall be entitled to receive the certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency and commence the business of banking, and shall be subject to the same laws and have the same rights and franchises as the banking associations now organized under said acts.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is not germane to the bill. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. RANDALL. I make the same point of order upon that amendment that I did upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is made too late.

Mr. RANDALL. I had no opportunity to make the point of order sooner, for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] took the floor immediately after the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My amendment is in the same line with the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. It proposes to amend the national banking law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is germane to the bill, then why is not mine germane?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that no one raised the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] at the time it was offered.

Mr. RANDALL. I would have raised it if I had had the opportunity, but the gentleman from Massachusetts immediately took the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. It is always in order to interrupt for the purpose of raising a point of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] shall be adopted, then will not the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] be germane to the bill as so amended?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule upon that question when it shall be raised.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to further amend this bill by adding the following section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That any gold coin now or hereafter in the Treasury of the United States shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of save as authorized by this section, as follows: Every sale of gold shall be advertised ten days in advance in the city of New York, and sealed proposals shall be invited, the same to be opened at the office of the Assistant Treasurer in that city. The time when these proposals shall be opened, and the day of sale and delivery, which shall be the same day or the day following that of opening the proposals, and the sum of gold to be sold shall be stated in the advertisement, as shall also be the terms of payment, which shall be made in lawful currency on delivery. At the time advertised the proposals shall be opened and read in public, and the highest bid shall be accepted for the whole sum to be sold, or so much thereof as shall be included in said highest bid. In case the highest bid does not call for the whole sum, the next highest bids shall be accepted for the sums respectively included therein, until the whole sum shall be sold. Persons offering equal prices shall be entitled to share the sum open to their bid, in proportion to the respective sums called for by each bid: Provided, That this section shall not prohibit the exchange of coin for bullion at the mints of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. LYNCH. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to say that there is such a provision in the bill already.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is such a provision in the bill, except the details.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out of order.

The Committee of the Whole here rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair for the purpose of receiving a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 610) in relation to corporations created by laws of the United States; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS, ETC., SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 485) to aid the improvement of the Des Moines and Rock Island rapids in the Mississippi river;

An act (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of John A. Neustaedter;

An act (H. R. No. 1284) imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 326) for the relief of Henry B. Ste. Marie;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 331) to grant American register to Hawaiian brig Victoria;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 338) exonerating certain vessels of the United States from the payment of tonnage fees to consular agents in Canada; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Z. M. Hall.

The Committee of the Whole then resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the FUNDING OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

Sec. — Be it further enacted, &c., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1869, the Secretary of the Treasury shall provide for the redemption in coin of all United States notes which may be presented at the Treasury or to any Assistant Treasurer for that purpose. And to enable him to do so, he is authorized to sell, or negotiate, or exchange, in the United States, or elsewhere, as many as may be necessary of the bonds provided to be issued by the first section of this act. But this shall not be held to prevent the Secretary from reissuing such notes so redeemed, to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "negotiate" the words "at not less than par;" so that the context will read: "and to enable him to do so he is authorized to sell, negotiate at not less than par, or exchange, in the United States, or elsewhere," &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order—that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is in order. It relates directly to a funding system.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted, there being—ayes sixty-four, noes not counted.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, as amended.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman who offers the amendment to explain what is the practical effect of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

The amendment as amended was not agreed to, there being—ayes eleven, noes not counted.

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, as soon as practicable, withdraw from circulation the national currency furnished to banks, and supply its place by the issue of legal-tender United States Treasury notes, known as "greenbacks," under such rules and regulations as may be established by the Treasury Department.

Mr. LYNCH. I rise to a point of order, that that amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That section three of this act shall be construed to apply only to the bonds and securities of the United States which are expressly payable in the lawful money of the United States.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Last evening three amendments were by unanimous consent reserved, and they will now be acted on: The first amendment, offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines twenty-one and twenty-two of section one strike out the words "and the proceeds thereof;" strike out line twenty-three and insert in lieu thereof the words "of or in;" so that the clause will read: And the said bonds shall be exclusively used for the redemption of, or in exchange for, an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment on which a vote was reserved was that of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section one by striking out these words: Which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following: Which said obligations shall be liable to taxation by or under State, municipal, or local authority to the same extent as money is taxed under such State, municipal, or local authority, and no greater.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee of Ways and Means propose that these low interest bonds shall be free from taxation; but as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] proposes to tax them, will he not modify his amendment so as to provide that the tax shall not exceed three and sixty-five hundredths per cent? [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. No, sir; I cannot make that modification.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—ayes 21, noes 65; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. KELSEY and Mr. NIBLACK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 77.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order to put it on the Journal that the count just made by the tellers showed a strict party vote? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be. The next amendment on which a vote was reserved was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations not less than $100 as he may prescribe, redeemable in coin at the end of twenty, thirty, and forty years respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at five per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.; which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States; and the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption of or in exchange for an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States other than the three per cent. certificates and debts past due or maturing before the end of the present fiscal year, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all outstanding or existing obligations as limited herein, and no more; but not exceeding $700,000,000 shall be redeemable at any one time.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected, only twenty-one voting in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question next recurred on the substitute proposed by Mr. BOUTWELL.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe of the denomination of $100, or of any multiple of $100, redeemable in coin of the present standard value of the United States, and upon the following terms and conditions, that is to say:

First. The Secretary of the Treasury may issue bonds as aforesaid to the amount in all of $400,000,000, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at any time after the 1st day of July, A. D., 1883, and bearing interest yearly at the rate of five per cent. and the payable semi-annually. And such bonds and the income therefrom shall be exempt from State, municipal, or local taxation, but they shall be liable to such income tax as may be levied by the United States upon other income, not exceeding, however, five per cent. of the interest upon such bonds; and the amount of the tax shall be deducted from the interest upon such bonds when the interest thereon is paid.

Second. The Secretary of the Treasury may also issue bonds as aforesaid to the further amount of $400,000,000, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at any time after the 1st day of July, A. D., 1883, and bearing interest yearly at the rate of four and a half of one per cent. in coin, payable semi-annually. And such bonds and the income therefrom shall be exempt from State, local, and municipal taxation, but they shall be liable to such income tax as may be levied by the United States upon other incomes, not exceeding, however, three per cent. of the interest upon such bonds, and the amount of the tax shall be deducted from the interest upon such bonds when the interest thereon is paid.

Third. That the Secretary of the Treasury may also issue bonds as aforesaid to the further amount of $400,000,000, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at any time after the 1st day of July, A. D., 1893, and bearing interest yearly at the rate of three sixty-five hundredths of one per cent. payable semi-annually in coin. The interest and principal of such bonds shall be made payable in the United States, or at London, Paris, or Frankfurt, at the option of the taker, and shall be exempt from all taxation in or by the United States, and the principal and interest thereof shall be paid as aforesaid without any abatement or deduction whatever.

Holders of bonds known as five-twenty bonds may exchange such bonds for the bonds in this section specified, applicants for an exchange of bonds may, within the limits prescribed by this act, designate the time when and the place where the new bonds issued to them shall be made payable, and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds except in exchange for five-twenty bonds.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale, negotiation, or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States, or of any coin or bullion disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent other than some proper officer of his Department to make such sale or negotiation of bonds and securities are hereby repealed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to use the sum of $25,000,000 of coin in the Treasury, and not otherwise appropriated, in the purchase of five-twenty bonds at the market price, as hereinafter provided, the same to be held by the Treasurer of the United States as a sinking fund, in accordance with the provisions of the fifth section of an act passed February 25, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States."

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, and the Attorney General, be, and they hereby are, constituted a commission for the purchase of bonds as required in the preceding section. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, give public notice for proposals for the sale of said bonds to the United States, and said commissioners may accept such proposals as they deem advantageous to the public interests. The bonds so purchased shall be legibly and indelibly marked "The property of the loan sinking fund of the United States." The Treasurer shall cause the interest to be paid upon such bonds, and the amount thereof shall in like manner be invested in the bonds of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the purchases of bonds herein authorized shall be made during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1883.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to give public notice whenever the amount of coin in the Treasury, belonging to the United States, exceeds $20,000,000 in addition to the amount appropriated by the third section of this act, that he will anticipate the payment of interest then first to become due upon the bonds of the United States to an amount as near as may be of the excess over said $20,000,000; such payments to be subject to a rebate of interest at the rate specified in the bonds.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, prohibited from making sales of gold for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is the question debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. CULLOM. Cannot the gentleman be allowed to go on by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. He cannot, as the committee is acting under the order of the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move the following amendment to the substitute:

Add to the end of section one:

Provided, That in all cases where the individual owner and holder in good faith of any of such bonds being a resident of the United States shall make it appear under oath, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, that the net income of such individual from all sources, for the year preceding one month prior to the time when such interest may be payable, did not exceed two hundred dollars—then and in all such cases the interest on such bonds so owned and held shall be paid without any deduction whatever.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the committee rise, so as to allow debate on the substitute.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 59.

Mr. BOUTWELL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. LOGAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 68.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. KELSEY. I move the following substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue registered or coupon bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations as he may prescribe, not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, payable, principal and interest, in coin, at such places in Europe or the United States as he shall designate and bearing interest at five per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and bearing date so as to require the payment of an equal amount of the interest quarterly; such bonds to be payable in fifty years from date, and to be redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after twenty-five years from date; to be issued to an amount sufficient to cover all outstanding or existing interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and to be exchanged for such obligations or disposed of in such manner and on such terms, not less than par, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem most conducive to the interests of the Government; and the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption of, or in exchange for, the existing interest-bearing securities of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the bonds issued under the first section of this act shall be known as the "consolidated debt of the United States," and the same shall be exempt from taxation in any form, by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, except that there shall be deducted from the interest or coupons of said bonds, at the time of paying such interest or coupons, one half of one per cent. on said bonds semi-annually, as taxes, which taxes shall be semi-annually invested in the bonds hereby authorized to be issued, and shall, together with the interest that shall accrue upon the bonds so purchased, form a sinking fund for the payment of the national debt; and the sinking fund hereby created shall be in lieu of the sinking fund contemplated by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several interest-bearing bonds of the United States that are redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after a certain number of years from their date, shall, at the option of the holder thereof, be exchanged for the bonds authorized by this act: Provided, That such bonds as are now redeemable shall be presented for exchange within six months after this act takes effect, and such bonds as hereafter become redeemable shall be presented for exchange within six months after the same shall become redeemable, and such exchange shall be made at such places and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the bonds issued pursuant to the provisions of this act may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for the redemption of national bank notes pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863, and from and after one year from the passage of this act the bonds herein authorized to be issued shall be the only bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for the redemption of national bank notes pursuant to said act, and all bonds now deposited with the Treasurer as security for the redemption of national bank notes shall be withdrawn and the bonds authorized by this act to be issued shall be substituted therefor.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. Is this amendment debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not; debate is closed.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KELSEY, it was disagreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute which I send to the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations not less than fifty dollars as he may prescribe, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after forty years, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum, which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes; such bond to be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all outstanding or existing obligations of the United States and no more.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That immediately after the taking effect of this act the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall give notice to all persons holding obligations against the United States, except the holders of Treasury notes, to present the same at maturity at the Treasury of the United States for payment. That all bonds of the United States, payable at the pleasure of the Government after five years from their date, commonly known as the five-twenties, and all such as are payable at the pleasure of the Government after three years from their date, known as seven-thirties, shall each be regarded as due and payable after five and three years from their dates respectively; and such Secretary of the Treasury shall pay all such obligations and bonds in the lawful currency of the United States, except as hereinafter provided; or such person or persons holding such bonds or obligations may exchange such bonds and obligations, in amounts of fifty dollars or multiples of that sum, for an equal amount of the bonds as provided for in the first section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. That all bonds issued prior to the 25th day of February, 1862, and all bonds known as the ten-forties, and all other obligations where the United States expressly stipulated to pay the same in coin, shall be so paid in coin, or the same may, at the pleasure of the holder or holders, except the interest payable in coin on bonds, be converted in equal amounts into the bonds provided for in the first section of this act, at any time within two years after the passage of this act, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by such Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make the payments as provided for in the second section of this act, he shall be required from time to time to issue and pay out upon such indebtedness such amount of Treasury notes, commonly known as greenbacks, as may be required to pay off such bonds and obligations of the United States, not payable in coin, as fast as the same may be presented for payment, as provided for in said second section of this act, where the person or persons presenting the same shall prefer payment in the Treasury notes of the United States to the exchange of his or their bonds or obligations for the bonds forming the funded debt, as provided for in the first section of this act; and such Treasury notes so issued and paid out as provided in this section shall have and possess all the legal qualities and be in every respect as binding upon the United States as its Treasury notes heretofore issued and known as greenbacks.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons holding bonds or other obligations against the United States which shall be drawing interest, and such person or persons shall not present the same at such Treasury or such other place as such Secretary shall prescribe for payment or exchange, as provided in the third section of this act, within six months after such notice when the same are due, or within six months after the same shall become due, after such notice as provided in said third section, then the interest on such bond or obligation shall cease from the date of six months after such notice, or within six months after such bond or obligation shall become due after such notice as aforesaid; and such Secretary of the Treasury shall, when such bond or obligation, so drawing interest, is presented for payment or exchange, only allow interest on such bond for six months after such notice, or for six months after the same becomes due after such notice as aforesaid, as provided in this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all bonds or other obligations of the United States received in exchange for bonds authorized to be issued by the first section of this act, and all such as shall be paid for by such Secretary in the lawful currency of the United States, shall be canceled by cutting with canceling hammer or punch when the same are taken up. And such Secretary shall keep an accurate account of all such bonds and obligations so taken up and canceled and the amount of such as were paid for in Treasury notes, and the amounts that were received in exchange for the bonds authorized to be issued by the first section of this act, and also the number, date, and amount of each bond so issued and given out in exchange, as aforesaid, and the name of the person to whom the same was issued, which bonds and obligations so canceled, and the account of bonds so issued and amount of money so paid out shall be by such Secretary presented to the Congress of the United States upon the first day of its regular session, after the same shall have been so received and canceled as aforesaid, so that Congress shall see that all such bonds and obligations so canceled are properly destroyed, and the accounts kept by such Secretary of such cancellation, and of the bonds and money so paid out and exchanged, as aforesaid, are correct.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the committee rise. The bill, as amended, ought to be printed; it is so long that we cannot well understand it. The motion was disagreed to—ayes 32, noes 74.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HUNTER, it was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the special order under consideration, being Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, had made sundry amendments thereto, and had directed him to report the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the gentleman if it is his intention to have a vote to-night on the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would like to. I do not know that it will be possible, but I will try as far as I can. If the yeas and nays are to be called on the various amendments it is not likely we can get through with it to-night.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The vote was so large on my proposition in the committee that I feel bound under a sense of duty to press it in the House. I would like to have the matter go over till Monday, so that members may see the bill in print, as there will be no opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must ask for a vote on the previous question.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 65, noes 60.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. BOUTWELL and SCHENCK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 73.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I now move as an amendment the proposition that I submitted in Committee of the Whole. I will say that I shall want about ten or twelve minutes to explain it. Whether I shall do it to-night, whether it will please the House better that it should go over till Monday, is a matter for the judgment of the House. [Cries of "Go on now!" and "No, no!" "Let us adjourn!"] I think in a few minutes we can get rid of this business; at any rate I can so state my views as to be willing to accept the judgment of the House upon the substitute which I have proposed. I think in ten or twelve minutes I can relieve the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand that if permitted to go on now for ten or twelve minutes he then proposes to have a vote on the substitute, or to have it go over until Monday morning? I ask this question from the fact that the substitute is in manuscript. It is not the printed bill which the gentleman presented, but is different from it, and if it is to go over until Monday it had better be printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. At the suggestion of several gentlemen, and especially of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I will move that the proposed substitute be printed; and perhaps it would be better that the bill, with the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, should be printed with it, and then I will yield for a motion to adjourn.

The motion to print the bill with the amendments and the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to ascertain the wish of the House in regard to meeting to-night; and I wish, with the permission of the House, to say a word in regard to the situation of business and the prospect of an adjournment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is not my motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman to make that motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. He yielded also to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I object to anything but the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I cannot say anything as to the prospect of adjournment or the condition of business?

Mr. UPSON. If the House adjourns now will there be a night session?

The SPEAKER. There is an order for an evening session for general debate, and the Chair was about to state that he is not informed that any gentlemen desire to speak this evening, and therefore an adjournment now, without dispensing with the evening session, would cause the Hall to be lit up when there would be no members here to speak.

Mr. SCHENCK. My object was to propose to go to the business on the Speaker's table to-night.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Before moving to adjourn I move that the evening session be dispensed with.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask to be permitted to make an inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. Can I ask a parliamentary question in regard to the effect of an adjournment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what the effect of an adjournment would be. If the House dispenses with the evening session and then adjourns, it will be an adjournment until Monday at twelve o'clock, and the consideration of this bill will be resumed after the morning hour. If the evening session is not dispensed with, and the House adjourns now, there will be an evening session for general debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Chair a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer questions.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a parliamentary question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object. The motion to dispense with the evening session was then agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 84, noes 39.

Mr. ALLISON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 33, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beck, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dixon, Dockery, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Jencks, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kerr, Knott, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loubridge, Marshall, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Paine, Phelps, Pile, Polsey, Randall, Sawyer, Seefeld, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodward—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Buckland, Cake, Churchill, Donnelly, Ferry, French, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Krontz, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pomeroy, Raum, Ross, Schenck, Spalding, Taylor, and William B. Washburn—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Benham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bromwell, Burr, Rodrick R. Butler, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dewesse, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Finney, Goss, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Heaton, Hinds, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Ketcham, Kitchen, Loan, Mann, Marvin, McCoombe, McCullough, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nunn, Peters, Pike, Plants, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Root, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Sypher, Taffe, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—83.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CAKE: The petition of William Wagner, a disabled and honorably discharged Union soldier, asking an increase of pension.

Also, the petition of Captain Jacob T. Fuhrman, a disabled and honorably discharged Union soldier, asking Congress to order the payment of his claim for property destroyed.

By Mr. CHURCHILL: The petition of Captain A. M. Brown, Dr. A. A. Yeomans and others, officers of the Army, asking for passage of bill to fix and equalize pay of officers of the Army, and for other purposes.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Colonel Chandler Crane and 10 others, officers of the Army, asking a continuance of the increased pay voted last year.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of officers of the Army, asking Congress to pass General Schenck's bill to fix and equalize the pay of officers and to establish the pay of enlisted soldiers of the Army.

By Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois: The petition for restoration of William Pollard, of Mobile, Alabama, late second assistant engineer United States Navy.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 20, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday last was dispensed with.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HENDRICKS to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Printing, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Johnson.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, respecting the assembling of large bodies of Indians at Fort Larned, Kansas, and the necessity of providing them with rations. The letter was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I hope, from the importance of it, the committee will take immediate notice of it.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the adoption of measures for the better treatment of the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Lewis P. Olds, of North Carolina, praying for the removal of disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, protesting against the ratification or confirmation by Congress of any conveyance of any part of the Yosemite valley by the State of California to individuals; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also presented two petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying an increase of compensation; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CONNESS presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the adoption of measures for the better treatment of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial, signed by President Barnard, of Columbia College, New York, and all the officers of the college, protesting against the ratification or confirmation by Congress of any conveyance of any part of the Yosemite valley by the State of California to individuals; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put a bill on its passage. It has passed the House, and it is necessary to pass it in order to settle some accounts. It will take no time.

Mr. POMEROY. We have reports from committees to present.

Mr. FERRY. Very well; if the gentleman insists on the order I shall not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports from committees are in order.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 907) to provide for the sale of certain lands and lots on the sea islands of Beaufort district, South Carolina, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of United States officers, merchants, and residents of Key West, Florida, praying that surveys may be made of the northwest channel leading from the harbor of Key West to the Gulf of Mexico, and that an appropriation may be made for removing obstructions and deepening the channel thereat, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of March last, information in relation to the buoys of New York harbor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 296) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Martha E. King, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Nancy Smith, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Videt Henry, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 634) granting a pension to Videt Henry. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

CONSIDERATION OF INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. DRAKE. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rule 38 be amended by adding thereto the following: treaties with Indian tribes or parts of tribes shall be considered and passed upon in open session.

Of course I do not suppose any action can be taken upon the resolution now under the rules. I merely wish to have it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration House bill No. 1010, relating to pensions. It is important that the bill should be passed as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions.

The bill had been reported by the Committee on Pensions with amendments. The first amendment was in line five of section one to strike out the word "or" and insert "nor;" and to strike out "pension" and insert "pensions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight of section one, after the word "sisters," to insert "under sixteen years of age."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve, to strike out "him" and insert "them;" and in line seventeen to insert the word "such" before "pension."

The amendment was agreed to.

The first section of the bill, as amended, is as follows:

That the laws granting pensions to the hereinafter-mentioned dependent relatives of deceased persons leaving neither widow nor child entitled to pensions under existing laws shall be so construed as to give precedence to such relatives in the following order, namely: first, mothers; secondly, fathers; thirdly, orphan brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age, who shall be pensioned jointly if there be more than one; Provided, That if, in any case, the said persons shall have left both father and mother who were dependent upon them, then on the death of the mother the father shall become entitled to a pension commencing from and after the death of the mother; and upon the death of the mother and father the dependent brothers and sisters under sixteen years of age shall jointly become entitled to such pension until they attain the age of sixteen years, respectively, commencing from and after the death of the party who, preceding them, would have been entitled to the same: And provided further, That no pension heretofore awarded shall be affected by anything herein contained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I inquire whether this bill does not propose a revision of the pension laws, and if so whether it is not a piece of legislation that ought to be considered at some other time than during the morning hour. I endeavored to attend to the bill as it was read; but it refers to so many antecedent acts, and appears to be so complicated in its references and provisions, that it will be impossible for any Senators to understand the bill or know its meaning and effect if it is pushed through at this time, except those Senators who happen to be upon the committee that reported the bill. I should like to know if there is any absolute necessity for its passage at this time. Why can it not go over until the next session? I would rather it should lie over until it can be examined.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This bill was reported from the committee on the 13th of June, and has been before the Senate consequently for more than a month, and it appears to me not to be of a different character from the bills that are usually taken up and disposed of in the morning hour. The gentleman's objection to the bill arises from the fact that the sections are not dependent upon each other. The whole object of the bill is to correct certain misconstructions in the law, supply some omissions in the law, and make other similar corrections which can very readily and very easily and very briefly be explained, in order to prevent such a flood of pension bills being thrown upon Congress as has been at this session. There have been misconstructions of the law at the Pension Office. The law in some cases is defective, perhaps, in a single word or two, which is now to be supplied, or some case of parallel nature to that mentioned in the law has not been mentioned. I think I am not at all out of order in asking for the consideration of the bill now, and I assure Senators that I do not think it will take a very long time. The amendments, I think, will be very generally concurred in without any difficulty, with one exception, perhaps.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to make a motion to reconsider a bill that was passed on Saturday last for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes from the retired list of the Navy to the active list. I understand the bill has gone to the House of Representatives, and I move that a request be sent to the House of Representatives requesting its return to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will be entertained if there be no objection.

Mr. NYE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is one of those motions that ought to be granted at once if it is to be granted at all.

Mr. DRAKE. I presume it cannot be taken over by a solitary objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. NYE. I object to it until I can have a chance to inquire into it. I reported that bill.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not understand that a single objection will prevent the consideration of a motion of this kind.

Mr. NYE. I think it will in the morning hour.

Mr. DRAKE. I make the motion that the House of Representatives be requested to return the designated bill to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot find that that is a privileged motion. If it was it could be considered; but it is not laid down as such.

Mr. NYE. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the bill before the Senate, and the Clerk will proceed with the amendments.

Mr. DRAKE. Do I understand the Chair to decide that this motion cannot be entertained because of a single objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; because there is a bill pending, and it is not a privileged motion, and if it is objected to it cannot be made, although it is one that ought to be among the privileged motions.

Mr. MORTON. The pending bill was taken up before the business of the morning hour was through—taken up out of order. There is no pressure and there is no necessity for its consideration. It is not a bill of that character which demands consideration before the end of the session. It is a very important bill proposing to revise the laws of Congress which have been enacted on the subject of pensions for the last three or four years, and it occurs to me that there is a decided impropriety in taking it up at this time and consuming the morning hour with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot guard against the effect of the rules, but can only enforce them. The Chair put it to the Senate distinctly to know if they would take up this bill, whether there was no objection to it. No objection was made, and therefore it was taken up, and of course it is before the Senate until the Senate overrules that motion. The bill will be proceeded with.

The Chief Clerk read the next amendment of the Committee on Pensions, which was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, and the acts supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof, shall not be construed to authorize the allowance of a pension, or to confer a right thereto by reason of a disability incurred or disease contracted after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1863, or death resulting therefrom, but the laws in force prior to the said act of July 14, 1862, shall, except as to the rate of pension, alone govern in the adjudication of all claims which have been or shall hereafter be made to a pension by reason of a disease contracted, a disability incurred, or a casualty occurring on or after the said 1st day of January, 1863, in the military or naval service of the United States, or death resulting therefrom.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I wish to say but a word or two on that amendment. The committee directed that section to be stricken out, in the first place because they could not understand its object, and because it seems to make two sets of laws operate together. It has since been explained that the object of it is to stop pensions in time of peace to all men, although it was admitted by the Pension Office authorities that there ought to be some provision in favor of the Navy, who are at all times exposed to casualties. I have drawn up a provision to take the place of this section if it shall be stricken out, and I suppose it can now be read for information. If the provision which I have drawn up should not be satisfactory to the Senate, I am willing that this section of the bill should be stricken out and the subject-matter of it acted on at the next session. I send my proposed amendment to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia in lieu of the second section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no person shall be entitled to a pension by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States subsequently to the passage of this act unless the person who was wounded or contracted disease was in the line of duty; and, if in the military service, was at the time actually in the field or on the march, or at some post, fort, or garrison, or after his muster-out or discharge for disability was returning to his usual residence in the United States; or if in the naval service, was at the time borne on the books of some ship or other vessel of the United States at sea or in harbor lately in commission, or was on his way by direction of competent authority to the United States or to some other vessel or naval station, or after his muster-out or discharge for disability, was returning to his usual residence in the United States.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ought to say that this amendment, as I have now proposed it, preserves the pensions to soldiers and sailors when they are in actual service, and I think as they are more liable to casualties than ordinary men this ought to be preserved. The number of the Army will be very much reduced, and the number of the Navy also; and it cannot be a great burden upon the country, and I think we owe it to these men who are exposing their lives handling fire-arms at sea, and doing other things of that kind, to preserve a pension to them, for casualties and losses of life happening even in peace.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on striking out the second section and inserting the proposition proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line seven, to strike out "two" and insert "three" before "years;" so as to make the clause read:

And the failure of any pensioner to claim his or her pension for a period of three years after the same shall have become due, shall be deemed presumptive evidence that such pension has legally terminated by reason of the pensioner's death, remarriage, recovery from disability, or otherwise, and the pensioner's name shall be stricken from the rolls, subject to the right of restoration to the same on a new application, with evidence satisfactorily accounting for the failure to claim such pension.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, after the word "amended," in line four, to insert "and reenacted;" after "evidence," in line fourteen, to insert "thereof;" in line sixteen to strike out "minor" before "child;" in line seventeen before "become" to insert "severally;" in line eighteen to strike out "minor;" and in line twenty-two to strike out "minor or minors" and insert "child or children;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That section eleven of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows: "That if any officer, soldier, or seaman shall have died of wounds received or of disease contracted in the line of duty in the military or naval service of the United States, leaving a widow and a child or children under the age of sixteen years, and it shall be duly certified under seal, by any court having probate jurisdiction that satisfactory evidence has been produced before such court that the widow aforesaid has abandoned the care of such child or children, or is an unsuitable person, by reason of immoral conduct, to have the custody of the same, or on presentation of satisfactory evidence thereof to the Commissioner of Pensions, then no pension shall be allowed to such widow until said child or children shall have severally become sixteen years of age, any previous enactment to the contrary notwithstanding; and the child or children aforesaid shall be pensioned in the same manner as if no widow had survived the said officer, soldier, or seaman, and such pension may be paid to the regularly-authorized guardian of such child or children."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight of section ten, to strike out "minor" before "child."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eleven, after the word "duty," in line seven, to insert "or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted therein;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That section one, of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, shall be so construed as to secure to every person entitled by law before the passage of said act to a less pension than twenty-five dollars per month, who, while in the military or naval service and in the line of duty, or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted therein, having only one eye, shall have lost the same, a pension of twenty-five dollars per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after section eleven, as a new section:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the existing laws in relation to pensions be so construed that the lowest rate of pensions allowed to any adult person, including widows of revolutionary soldiers, and for the lowest degree of disability, shall be eight dollars per month, and for a higher degree of disability the pension allowed shall be in accordance with the first section of the act cited in section ten of this act as thereby amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That all officers in the military or naval service, of the rank of captain in the Army or lieutenant in the Navy, and of less rank, who have lost a leg or arm in such service and in the line of duty, or in consequence of wounds received or disease contracted therein, shall be entitled to receive an artificial limb on the same terms as privates in the Army are now entitled to receive the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to offer some other amendments. I move this as an additional section, to come in after section three:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases where an increase of pension has been or may hereafter be granted to any widow or guardian of children under sixteen years of age of a deceased soldier or sailor under an act entitled "An act increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes," approved July 25, 1866, or any subsequent act, such widow or the guardian of such children shall not be deprived of such increase by reason of any child or children of such deceased soldier or sailor being the inmate of any home, orphan's asylum, or other public or private charitable institution organized for the care and education of soldiers' orphans under the laws of any of the States, or in any school or institution where such orphans may in whole or in part be maintained or educated at the expense of a State or of the public.

This amendment presents this single question, whether children who are taken into the soldiers' homes and orphan's asylums shall be deprived of the two dollars a month allowed them by the law of 1866? The law is express that it shall be paid to the children, but by a construction at the Pension Office they decline to pay those who are in these asylums. Many letters have been written to the committee in consequence of which this amendment is proposed. It appears that these children have their vacations, and they go home, so that they are part of the time burdensome to their mothers. At any rate, they have nothing from the asylums but the regulation food and the regulation dress of the institution, and it is thought that the mother ought to have it in her power to give them at their vacations, if at no other time, a little extra food and clothing. I trust there will be no objection to this amendment. It is in accordance with the law, but it is necessary to pass it in order to correct a construction at the Pension Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to amend the bill by adding at the end of section five:

Except that applications by or on behalf of insane persons and children under sixteen years of age may be filed after the expiration of the said five years if previously thereto they were without guardians or other proper legal representatives.

This amendment explains itself. The provision is that if insane persons and children without guardians fail to apply within the time limited advantage is not to be taken of it to deprive them of their pension.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to amend the bill by striking out all of the sixth section after the word "practicable," in line three, and inserting:

Give public notice of the contents of the foregoing section, particularly at the offices of the several pension agencies, and upon any application by letter or otherwise for or on behalf of any person entitled to the benefit of its provisions, or upon any notification that such person is so entitled, to pay or cause to be paid to him all such arrears of pension as he may be entitled to under the provisions of the said section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I offer the following new section, which has been agreed upon by the two committees, and will save Congress a great deal of labor. It is to come in after section eleven:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases pensions heretofore or hereafter granted by special acts of Congress shall be subject to be varied in amount according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I now move in line seven of section eight to strike out the words "and after the proof has been completed;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That section six of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, be and the same is hereby amended and reenacted, so as to read as follows: "That if any person entitled to a pension has died since March 4, 1861, or shall hereafter die while an application for such pension is pending, leaving no widow and no minor child under sixteen years of age, his or her heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to which the applicant would have been entitled had the certificate been issued before his or her death."

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems to me that that is a very extensive proposition. How long is the pension to run in favor of the heirs?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. According as the law fixes now. It does not affect that. The section now requires that a man shall not only have made in his lifetime an application for the pension, but that the proof shall have been completed in his lifetime in order that his heirs may get it. It was thought by the committee unnecessary to exact that the proof should have been completed. They thought that if a man applied in his lifetime, though the proof should be completed afterward, the heirs ought to be entitled to the pension due him, and hence they have moved to strike out these words.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the pensions for the officers in the military service and Marine corps of the United States hereinafter named and for officers of assimilated rank, shall be as follows: for a major general or officer of higher rank, fifty dollars per month; for a brigadier general, forty dollars per month; and for a colonel, thirty-five dollars per month; and for the officers in the naval service hereinafter named and officers of assimilated rank shall be as follows: for a rear admiral or officer of higher rank, fifty dollars per month; for a commodore, forty dollars per month; and for a captain, thirty-five dollars per month. And the pensions of the widows and dependent relatives of the said officers entitled to pensions by existing laws, shall be the same as those of the decedents to whom they succeed; but the increase of pension allowed by this section shall not be computed from any date previous to the approval of this act.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator how much this increases the pensions?

Mr. WILSON. By the pension laws at the present time the highest rate is thirty dollars a month, that allowed to a lieutenant colonel, and the same for the corresponding grade in the Navy. This amendment would give a colonel an increase of five dollars per month, a brigadier general ten dollars, and a major general twenty dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very ungracious task to object to a pension of any amount to a person who has been in the military service; but I submit to the Senate whether it is wise now, in the present condition of the public business, at this stage of the session, the attention of the Senate having scarcely been called to this bill, to raise the pensions of any portion of the Army or Navy. At a time when we are endeavoring to lower all the expenses of the Government; when we have reduced all our appropriations; when we have thrown off $100,000,000 of taxes, and yet when taxes are still very burdensome on our people; when the pension fund now is $33,000,000 a year—twice as much as any nation in the world ever paid before—I ask whether it is worth while for us to increase our pension lists on a mere amendment of a bill of this kind. I do not like to object to anything of this sort, because I have the same feeling that other Senators have, a feeling of kindness and commiseration for those who have been wounded in the service of the country; but if this amendment is pressed I shall have to make opposition to it and move the postponement of the bill. If the bill is only intended to remove ambiguities in existing laws I have no objection, as the Senator from West Virginia has stated, but I cannot consent to this increase of pensions.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that I do not want to endanger the passage of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. You had better withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. The amendment I have offered has the assent of the Military Committee and a portion certainly of the Naval Committee; but rather than endanger the passage of the bill, I will withdraw it and bring it up at some other period.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to go to the Pension Committee at any rate, to be there considered.

Mr. WILSON. The chairman of the Pension Committee has examined it very carefully.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but it ought to go to the committee, and be reported upon by them.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. With the permission of the Senators, I think the Senator from Ohio is under some misapprehension about this bill. The bill as it has been acted on will reduce pensions on the whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say I do not object to the bill.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This amendment is offered simply to increase the pensions of the higher class of officers. By the law now the highest pension to the grade of lieutenant colonel of the Army and all over it, and the corresponding grades in the Navy, is thirty dollars per month. This amendment proposes that colonels shall have thirty-five dollars, the ascending grade being five dollars a grade, a brigadier general forty dollars, a major general and higher rank fifty dollars. We are constantly besieged with petitions which our committee have felt themselves bound to return here in many cases and refer them to the Military Committee, because they appeared to us simply as gratuities. We do not concede that we have any power to change the law. What we are to do, and what we set ourselves to do with a solemn feeling of duty in relation to it, is that every person who by law is entitled to a pension shall get it. I do not care about pressing this amendment upon this bill at this time, though I apprehend from the small number of these high grades the amount named upon the pensions would be inconsiderable. I leave it to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand it is withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON. Rather than make any trouble about it, I withdraw the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. SPRAGUE, it was Ordered, That S. W. & E. R. Clarke have leave to withdraw their petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (S. No. 635) to extend the term of letters-patent issued to Richard M. Hoe, accompanied by a report. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill (S. No. 636) in reference to certain accounts on the books of the Treasury Department against John A. Dix, Richard M. Blatchford, and George Opdyke; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas H. Dowling, praying the passage of a law restoring to him the possession of his property known as the Island of Yerba Buena in the harbor of San Francisco, submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition; which was agreed to.

FOURTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the leave of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] I desire to move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 166) declaring the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which on my motion was referred to it on Saturday, and that the resolution lie on the table, as I desire to call it up. I have the leave of the Judiciary Committee to make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 622, with a view of getting a vote on it this morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to make a report. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the report upon agriculture, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution reported by him at this time. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate twenty thousand extra copies of the agricultural report for 1867, and three thousand extra copies for distribution by the Agricultural Bureau.

Mr. MORTON. I believe my motion was to take up Senate bill No. 622, with a view to getting a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was so; but during the morning hour, while there is morning business, the Chair understands that when a Senator rises to present morning business he is not consenting to take up a bill which requires the unanimous consent of the Senate. Of course it cannot be understood that he is urging his proposition for the morning business, and at the same time consenting that another bill shall be taken up. Therefore this is in order, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution, the Senate having agreed to take it up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand the committee have reported an amendment, and I should like to know what it is.

Mr. ANTHONY. The amendment reduces the number.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us hear it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can state it quicker than the Clerk can read it. The original resolution proposed to print twenty-five thousand copies of the report for the use of the Senate, and five thousand for the use of the Commissioner. The report of the committee reduces the number to twenty thousand and three thousand, the number that we printed last year.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not understand the Senator. What report is it proposed to publish?

Mr. ANTHONY. The report of the Commissioner of Agriculture; the regular agricultural report.

Mr. POMEROY. How many copies do you propose to print?

Mr. ANTHONY. Twenty thousand, the same as last year. The resolution as referred to the committee recommended twenty-five thousand copies, and we have cut it down to twenty thousand.

Mr. POMEROY. Is there anything in it about a map of the United States, or any maps? [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Not that I know of. We shall not have any maps printed with our consent.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire what will be the expense?

Mr. ANTHONY. About a dollar a copy.

Mr. CAMERON. This is the usual resolution ordering the usual number of the agricultural report to be printed, and of course nobody will object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up for consideration House bill No. 1021.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to make a motion that pertains to the business of the morning hour, and I object to the present consideration of the motion of the Senator from Arkansas, or that of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over for the present.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (S. No. 617) to reduce the military peace establishment of the United States; which was ordered to be printed.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate at five o'clock to-day take a recess until half past seven o'clock, for the purpose of considering certain bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY and Mr. STEWART. Say general business.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to get through some of the business of our committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that at five o'clock the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. MORTON. I renew my motion to take up Senate bill No. 622.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion pending.

Mr. POMEROY. If this recess is to be for the continuation of the business that is before the Senate I have no objection; but if we are to consider a bill for an hour and then lay it aside and let it go over, I object to it. We have got now as many as five or six unfinished bills that have gone over and something else been taken up. I have no objection to a recess that will continue the business of the session; but I hope when we enter upon the consideration of a bill that we shall finish it. Unless we finish something all the bills will go over as unfinished business.

Mr. WILSON. In order to prevent the consumption of any more time I will modify the motion as suggested, and run the possible chance that of the many bills the Military Committee desire to have considered we may have the privilege of getting up one.

Mr. CONKLING. You had better stick to your original motion. You will carry that if you stick to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock until half past seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg the indulgence, only for a minute, of the Senator from Indiana, to pray that the Senate will take up a little resolution allowing the importation free of duty of the cap to a military monument at Harrisburg, which has passed the other House.

Mr. DRAKE. I object.

Mr. CAMERON. On what ground do you object?

Mr. DRAKE. Because this is the morning hour, and the morning business is not disposed of.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator will see that there are just one or two minutes left of the morning hour.

Mr. DRAKE. I have been trying for some time to make a motion that belongs to the business of the morning hour. The only reason why I object to this bill, or any other, is because I wish to make a motion that is, in my opinion, a privileged question, and belongs to the morning hour. I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill looking to the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes to the active list of the Navy. I made the motion some time ago, but it was carried over, because there was then a bill under consideration.

Mr. NYE. I object to the consideration of that motion.

Mr. CAMERON. Now, Mr. President, I hope you will put my motion. I pledge myself that I shall not say a word in favor of it. I merely desire to have the resolution read and considered. It is only four lines, and I ask the Senator from Indiana to give way for one minute to allow me to do so.

Mr. MORTON. It is not nearly so important as the bill I ask the Senate to take up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This demand for the consideration of the morning business is exceedingly earnest just now. It has been customary when a bill has been called up to consider it. The bill urged upon the Senate by my colleague is one that has a claim upon the consideration of the body, for it has been very considerably discussed, and it is quite as appropriate to the morning hour as the proposition of the Senator from Missouri. It is a bill of great importance to western commerce, and I think we have a right to expect of the Senate its consideration. I ask that the motion made by him shall be put to the Senate, and then we shall know whether the bill has the favor of this body or not.

Mr. CAMERON. I am as much in favor of the passage of the bill of which the Senator from Indiana has just spoken as any gentleman here, and I shall give it my vote.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the unfinished business of Saturday, being the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States, is before the Senate, superseding everything else.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the two Senators from Indiana to give way for one moment to pass the joint resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. CONNESS. On the bill which is the unfinished business, I desire to say that, so far as I feel interested in it, I wish the Senate would come to a vote without much further discussion. Considering the condition of the public business, I hope that that will be the case. The Senate understands the question, and I am willing that we shall come to a vote upon it, and hope we shall.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator why he will not withdraw the amendment he proposes and take the vote on the amendment as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and be done with it?

Mr. CONNESS. For the reason that I want a vote on my amendment. Of course, if the Senate vote that down, then they will vote on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I appeal to the Senator from California to allow the unfinished business to pass over informally for a short time, and see if we cannot get a vote on the bridge bill. It is very important that the vote should be taken to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. I would yield to the Senator if to anybody, as he well knows; but the importance of coming to a vote upon this bill now cannot be overstated. I think we can get a vote this morning so as to take it out of the way and let the bill of the Senator from Indiana and other pressing business be acted upon. Therefore I hope we shall go on with it and vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California to the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in section three, line ten, to strike out the words "to suspend in part or wholly commercial relations with the said Government, or in case no other remedy is available."

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, obtained the floor.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator from New Hampshire kindly yields to me for one moment. It will be recollected that the other day a bill of which I had charge had actually passed, at least I think the vote was taken, (H. R. No. 1376,) and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] asked me to delay it a short time that he might make an inquiry in regard to it. I desire now to have the vote declared on that bill with the assent of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator cannot do that.

Mr. THAYER. It is simply to have the vote declared. My recollection is that it was taken and the bill was actually passed. It is necessary to have it go to the House and have the amendment concurred in. All parties are satisfied in regard to it.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Chair will decide that that may be done, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator knows as well as the Chair does, that while this bill is before the Senate, nothing else can be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I hope we shall go on with it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand the Senator from Nebraska to move to postpone this bill with a view to taking up the one mentioned by him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand him to make any motion. If he did he will state it.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator from New Hampshire yielded to me the floor. I did not understand that the Senator from California had any control of it. I simply desire to have the vote declared. The bill did pass, and I might have insisted upon it then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska must understand that his motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent of the Senate, and that the Senator from California is objecting to it. Therefore it cannot be considered.

Mr. THAYER. Then I move that the vote on that bill be declared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing can be done except to go on with the bill under consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say to the honorable Senator from Nebraska before we go on, that I had stated that if the Chair would decide that the vote might be declared I had no objection; but I would object to anything further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator knows that the Chair cannot declare that under the rule.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, the Senator from California, after having made his speech on this subject on Saturday, seems very anxious that the vote should now be taken without any further remarks; but I think it would be well to consider a few of the points which he made on Saturday against the bill as it came from the Committee on Foreign Relations. He moves an amendment to the bill striking out the reprisal clause, so far as commerce is concerned, but retains it in reference to individuals, and that certainly is the most offensive part of that section of the bill.

I wish to say a word in relation to some strictures which he made upon the committee. He intimated that the committee had more ideas than sympathy upon this subject. I admit that they had some "views," as he expressed it, upon the subject which modified slightly their sympathies; but that any member of the committee had less sympathy with the bill or the objects to be secured by the bill than the gentleman from California, I deny. They understood what perhaps he does not understand, or at any rate what he did not intimate in any remarks which he made, that the bill immediately affects one sixth of the entire population of this country. We have six million foreigners in this country, every man, woman, and child of whom is to be affected by this bill. The committee understood perfectly well that this class of people had cast their lot among us; that we are indebted to them for wealth, for industry, for their efforts to save our Government when it has been assailed by the enemies of the country; and though the country is theirs by adoption, they have made it their own by burying their heroic dead in its bosom. These are the men who come here and ask the passage of this bill; and every member of the committee is anxious that their claims and their voices should be heard on this subject.

But the question is, whether we shall put into the hands of the President of the United States the power to make reprisals upon the commerce and the innocent subjects of foreign Governments which may have offended against our citizens. I suppose the gentleman knows perfectly well that this bill rests upon a different understanding as to the law of nations between some European Governments and our own.

The gentleman from Michigan, very much to my surprise, spoke of the "American doctrine" on Saturday. Why, sir, the idea that the right of expatriation is inalienable, natural, is not American in any peculiar sense unless it is because the American people have adopted the idea. It is older than the very existence of our Government, and the doctrine was advocated by publicists before the American continent was discovered.

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator will allow me a moment, I did not speak of the right of expatriation, which is a right as old as the Roman law, as being peculiarly an American doctrine. What I spoke of as the peculiar American doctrine was this, that when a foreigner had become naturalized under our laws, he was as much entitled to the protection of our Government abroad or elsewhere as a native-born citizen of the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I do not see that the gentleman's explanation makes any difference. Plato said in his day that—

"At Athens it was permitted to each person, upon examining the laws and customs of the republic, if there was nothing found to his charge, to retire, with all of his goods, wherever else it pleased him."

Again:

"The Romans obliged no person to reside in their State, and Cicero warmly praised this maxim; he said, 'that every man ought to be able to retain or renounce his right, and that this is the firmest foundation of liberty.'"

Grotius adopts the same theory, but proceeds to qualify it in this way:

"That one ought not to leave the State if the interests of civil society demand that he should remain there."

So that the doctrine is not a new doctrine; is not an American doctrine at all; but it comes in conflict with the doctrine as laid down by England and several of the European Governments. Here is an epitome of the doctrine of England on this subject of expatriation:

"The allegiance of a subject, according to the law of England, is permanent and universal; he can, by no act of his own, abjure or repudiate the duties which it involves; nor can he, by emigration, or any voluntary change of residence, escape its legal consequences."

And then it goes on to say that the doctrine is "founded in reason and the nature of government." Now, you see there is a direct conflict between the American idea, if the Senator prefers so to designate it, and the European idea on this subject of expatriation. We may pass a law through our House of Representatives and Senate, and its force cannot extend beyond our territory. No law of ours has any extra territorial power. Questions of difference upon international law must be settled by treaty and not by law. If we hold one doctrine and England holds the very opposite, and we put in the hands of the President of the United States the power to make reprisals, it is simply declaring war by an act of legislation. The committee thought it very unwise to put such powers into the hands of a single man, even the President of the United States; that it would be better to hold that matter subject to the authority and supervision of Congress. It was for this reason that the section which the gentleman has sought to amend was stricken out by the committee before it was thrust into the Senate.

But the gentleman from California said in reply to the chairman of the committee that the quotations he had made from writers upon international law did not apply to times of peace; that they referred peculiarly and solely to a period of war. He ought to know better than that. He ought to know that the question of reprisals, the lex talionis, refers not specially to a time of war, but a period antecedent to the declaration of war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Always.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. "Always," the gentleman from Vermont says. War frequently follows when the nation upon whom we have retaliated refuses to make reparation for the wrong which they have done. So that the references made by the gentleman from Massachusetts were directly applicable to the case in hand, and not to a time of war.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, surely the references made to the acts of the first Napoleon were during and pending wars.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The acts of the first Napoleon were not the sole acts referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNESS. They were acts quoted in exposition of his doctrine.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will refer to Vattel or to Wheaton, he will find in almost every passage in either of those authors upon this subject reference is had, not to a time of war, but to a time of peace.

Now, let us look for a moment at the bearing of the amendment which the gentleman offers on this subject. He desires that we shall give up this reprisal upon the commerce of the offending nation, but that we shall retain the right of reprisal upon the innocent subjects of the offending nation. Let me read a passage from the notes of Mr. Dana in his last edition of Wheaton. He says:

"The right of making reprisals is not limited to property, but extends to persons. Still, the practice of modern times discountenances the arrest and detention of innocent persons, strictly in the way of reprisals."

"It is agreed that reprisals for private wrongs should never be resorted to by a Government until all reasonable appeals to the Government of the wrong-doer have been exhausted."

Now, the question is whether we shall put it into the power of the President of the United States, whenever the English Government, for instance, has seized an American citizen and cast him into prison, to retaliate upon the subjects of that Government. Why, sir, take it during the last war. Some of the rebels of the South escaped into Canada, and there they combined against the Government of this country, laid their schemes to make inroads upon our institutions and property on this side of the line. Suppose that this Government had taken offense with the English Government or the provincial government for the part which it took in the trial of those offenders, and had seized subjects of Great Britain in New York or Massachusetts and thrust them into prison, put them there, as the gentleman says, to rot; the very thing which he objects to in the English Government we should become guilty of ourselves. It would be far more honorable if the English Government seizes an American citizen unjustly and casts him into prison to use the whole power and all the resources of the nation to seek redress from the Government which has offended rather than to take innocent parties and make them accountable for the offense of their Government.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will bear with me for a moment, as I do not propose to speak again, I desire to say that I do not think he has stated my position fairly.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I have no wish to misrepresent the gentleman.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose the Senator does not intend to misstate it. He has just quoted from a book which declares precisely the position stated in this bill as it will stand if amended as I propose, namely, that reprisals are not to be resorted to by any nation against another or the people of another until all reasonable modes of adjustment have been exhausted, and then it is accepted as one of the means. Now, what does this bill say as proposed to be amended:

"That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested, and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign, and whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused."

The very acts that the authority states must be exhausted before reprisals are resorted to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The gentleman knows very well that one of the principal objects of his bill is to meet a case which is now before the public mind—the action of England in respect to our naturalized citizens from Ireland. I am fully in sympathy with the Irish people in their desire to secure justice from the English Government. I think they have been oppressed and wronged for generations; and I desire, as I think every right-minded American must desire, that that wrong should cease; that the English Government shall be brought to justice. But it is not strange when the Irish population who have been naturalized in this country are combining to secure this end, and the English Government is on the alert to counteract the influence of those combinations, that now and then an innocent person should be arrested and cast into prison. We might have done that ourselves during the late war; and it is not right, it is not proper in any view, that in a bill of this kind, passing through the Congress of the United States, we should do anything which will commit our Government to the effort of the Irish people to secure their rights. I desire that justice shall be done to the Irish people, for I want to see that generous people lifted up to the place which is theirs by a natural right. The nation that has furnished the poets and orators and statesmen to England for half a dozen generations should have justice done to it; but do not let us here, in passing a bill of this nature through the Senate, do a wrong to our own Government through our sympathies for this oppressed people. The committee desire that justice shall be done, but they do not want that we should do a wrong to innocent parties, which might be done under this reprisal clause of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not fully satisfied with the amendment to the pending bill proposed by the Senator from California, although I regard it as an improvement upon the bill as it passed the House. Nor am I satisfied with this bill as the Committee on Foreign Relations proposes to amend it; and I have, with due deference to all, prepared an amendment which I shall offer in due time, and, with the consent of Senators, I will have it read now for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to strike out all of the third section after the enacting clause and insert:

"That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused it shall be the duty of the President to use such means as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the President to Congress."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, so far as the preamble to this bill is concerned, it states some propositions which are correct, and some which, in point of fact, are not correct, and probably never will be correct in the history of the United States; and this bill, in my judgment, would be improved, would be made more consistent with the history of the country, and with the principles that we intend to establish, if the preamble was stricken out. I regard preambles as objectionable, because they sometimes by their recitals commit Congress to positions which it may not wish to occupy when future questions of legislation may arise.

Passing, however, from the preamble to section one of the bill; that simply provides that the courts and officers of the United States shall declare the law to be as defined in this bill. That is all the duty that is imposed upon the Government or any officer of the Government by the first section of the bill.

Section two proceeds to declare what the law is, so far as naturalized citizens are concerned. It is simply declaratory of the law.

A bill that undertakes simply to declare what the law is upon a given subject and does not provide any means for its enforcement, that does not provide any remedy in case the law is violated, is certainly a law of very little practical value. Section three, if I understand it as it was passed by the House, although it suggests some objectionable propositions, yet does not provide any means for the enforcement of the principle which is declared in the second section of the bill. It simply provides that whenever it is made known to the President that a naturalized citizen of the United States "is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign," then the President is "empowered" to do certain things; but he is not required to do anything. In such a case he is empowered to suspend commercial relations with the aggressive country.

He is empowered to arrest a citizen of that country who may happen to be in the United States; but whether he will do so or not is entirely left to his discretion. No duty is imposed upon the President of the United States in any way to protect any citizen in a foreign country. I concur with the committee in recommending that those portions of the bill which confer the specific powers there named upon the President should be stricken out, for the reason that they only provide two specific ways by which the rights of American citizens abroad shall be vindicated; one is by suspending commercial intercourse with the foreign country, and the other is by arresting a citizen of that country in the United States, when there may be a great variety of cases arising where other and different means would be equally effective, and where the end desired could be accomplished without resorting to such dangerous and violent measures.

Now, if I understand this bill, it only provides protection for a naturalized citizen of the United States. Although the bill would seem to convey the idea in one clause that if any citizen shall be arrested and detained abroad, and his release on demand shall be unreasonably delayed and refused, the President shall proceed as prescribed in this bill; yet that clause refers "to the said Government," and to "such foreign Government" in other clauses of the bill, implying that it must be that Government which arrests the citizen upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve the citizen's allegiance to his native sovereign. I do not know that I fully understand the meaning of that section. I think it ought to be made clear and distinct, so that it will not be susceptible of misconception; but according to its fair interpretation, it seems to me that it only undertakes to protect naturalized citizens in foreign countries, and in that respect I think the bill is greatly defective, for it ought to provide for the protection of all American citizens in foreign countries. I can see no reason why this special protection should be extended to naturalized citizens and not extended to native-born citizens of the United States.

This bill, if I understand it, only provides a remedy where a citizen is arrested upon the mere allegation, and upon no other ground, that naturalization in the United States does not dissolve his allegiance to the Government under which he was born. If an American citizen is arrested in a foreign country upon any other ground, upon any other pretext whatever, or if he be a native citizen, then he is not, according to the terms of this bill, entitled to the protection of this Government. I insist that if we undertake to pass a bill, and engage in solemn legislation under a proclamation that we are proceeding to protect the rights of American citizens in foreign countries, we shall not reach the "lame and impotent conclusion" that no citizen is to be protected in a foreign country unless he is naturalized, and is arrested upon the mere ground or pretense by a foreign Government that naturalization does not dissolve the allegiance of a man to the Government under which he was born.

The amendment that I propose provides that whenever it shall be made known to the President of the United States that an American citizen has been deprived of his liberty in a foreign country it shall be the duty of the President to do something; not that he shall have power, if in his judgment he sees proper, to act; but he shall proceed at once and investigate the facts of the case, and he shall ascertain whether that imprisonment is rightful or wrongful, whether or not it violates the rights of American citizenship; and if he ascertains that the imprisonment is unjust and unfounded, that it is made upon some frivolous pretext, that it is made for some alleged political opinion which the party entertains to which that Government does not give its sanction, that he shall proceed upon ascertaining the facts and demand the release of that citizen so imprisoned, and if that Government after this demand is made by the Executive shall unreasonably refuse to grant that release, then my amendment requires him to use such means as in his judgment may be necessary and proper to obtain or to effectuate the release.

There can be no possible objection to this amendment, as it seems to me, except to that portion of it which proposes to confer discretionary power upon the Executive of the United States. It will be observed that it does not require him to seize any property; it does not require him to suspend commercial relations, but he is left to exercise his judgment as the circumstances of the case may require in order to obtain the release of the American citizen who is wrongfully imprisoned in a foreign country. He may resort to all the instrumentalities of diplomacy to accomplish that purpose. He may intimate to the foreign Government that the United States will regard its acts as violative of international law, and will not submit to outrages upon the rights of its citizens; and such an intimation coming from the Executive of the nation under a law of this description will have power, will produce influence, and in many cases, I venture to say, it will result in the release of the person imprisoned.

Now, sir, if I understand the history of this subject, many grievances which our citizens suffer in foreign countries arise from inattention on the part of the American Government. I believe it is a fact that the citizens of no civilized country upon the globe receive so little attention in foreign countries from their own Government as the citizens of the United States; and this law, if it is to amount to anything at all, ought to compel the Executive to proceed forthwith to give attention to these complaints whenever it is alleged to the Executive of the country that a citizen of the United States is suffering in a foreign prison, it should be the duty of the Executive forthwith to proceed and examine into the case, otherwise the rights of American citizenship are of little value whatever in a foreign country.

I admit that this power in the hands of the Executive may be employed so as to produce mischievous effects. No the power conferred on the President by the Constitution of the United States, to be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, may be perverted and abused, and may be used for the destruction of the Government. Something must be intrusted to the Executive in reference to this matter. He is the proper department of the Government to act, and the action should be at once; because delays, under some circumstances, are dangerous and absolutely destructive of the end to be accomplished. It cannot be presumed that the President will exercise this power to the detriment of the country. Law has been read by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, showing that a reprisal, such as is contemplated by the bill, is contrary to the usages of nations, and if the power is conferred upon the President, it is not to be presumed that the Executive will violate the law of nations or undertake to exercise any of the dangerous powers that are now specifically conferred upon him by the bill. But, sir, he may negotiate for the release of an American citizen imprisoned in a foreign country. He may use all the influences that he can to secure his restoration to liberty; and cases may arise where it would be the duty of the Executive of the nation, and where he ought to have the power at once, without any delay, to wrest an American citizen from the clutches of a despot in a foreign country. I can imagine many cases where the Executive should be invested with the power at once to proceed and vindicate the rights of American citizenship upon foreign soil by all the power of the nation.

The idea that when an American citizen is arrested without cause in a foreign country he is to lie in a dungeon, if that be the will of the foreign Power, until the President of the United States shall communicate the matter to Congress and Congress shall proceed with its endless debates to discuss the subject before any relief shall be afforded is simply a mockery, to "Keep the promise to our ear

And break it to our hope."

I think, therefore, that we ought to make it the positive duty of the President to act in the cases contemplated by this bill in the case of all citizens naturalized or native born who may be wrongfully imprisoned in foreign countries. We can safely intrust this discretionary power to him as we do in other cases, presuming, of course, that the President of the United States, under his responsibility to the American people, would not wantonly and wickedly involve this nation in war.

Sir, he has that power now if he sees proper to abuse and pervert it. I believe it was alleged by a great party in the country that President Polk involved the United States in a war with Mexico without any legislation or action on the part of Congress. The power that was in the hands of Polk is in the hands of every Executive, and if you proceed upon the ground that no judgment is to be given to the Executive, as proposed in my amendment, then you ought to strip him of all the discretionary power which he exercises.

Sir, without consuming more time, it appears to me that this bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, is objectionable as I have indicated, and if it is amended as proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations it is emasculated and simply provides in effect that the President, if he ascertains certain facts, shall communicate those facts to Congress, when, perhaps, the same facts would be as well known to Congress without as with such a communication, and it amounts to nothing in a practical point of view for the protection of American citizens in foreign countries. I hope it will be amended so that it may be made effective, and so that it will reach the purposes which this legislation contemplates.

MR. MORTON. I concur very much with the remarks made by the Senator from California last Saturday upon the amendment offered by him. His speech was eloquent, and evidently came from his heart as well as from his head; and I agree with him in the sentiments he uttered and sympathize with the purpose of his speech; but I differ with him somewhat in regard to the remedy proposed for the evils to be redressed. I agree with the preamble of this bill that the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right, because it is a part of our liberty. A man is shorn of a very important part of his liberty who has not the right to leave one country and make his home in another.

MR. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator a question right at this place. Suppose the country to be engaged in war; has its Government a right to prevent its citizens leaving the country to avoid their duties in its defense?

MR. MORTON. The Senator from Connecticut proposes, perhaps, an extreme case, which I will not undertake to discuss just now. There may be considerations of public safety, in time of war, which overrule, for the time being, the natural rights, as such considerations do in very many other cases. I say that a man's right to withdraw from his native country and make his home in another, and thus cut himself off from all connection with his native country, is a part of his natural liberty, and without that his liberty is defective. We claim that the right to liberty is a natural, inherent, God-given right, and his liberty is imperfect unless it carries with it the right of expatriation. So I concur with the preamble of this bill; and I fully concur with the further declaration that "all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign States, shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances."

Mr. President, this may be said to be an emigrant nation; we were all emigrants but a few generations back, and the very character of the country, the way our nation has been brought into existence, makes the assertion of this principle a necessity. We invite men of foreign birth to our shores; they come; they bring to us wealth and labor and development and power, and we are bound, by every principle of natural justice and of national duty to protect these men as if they were born upon our soil wherever they may go. It is a duty incumbent upon the Government, for they are only in the assertion themselves of a natural and inherent right, and it is our duty to protect our citizens in the enjoyment of their natural inherent rights wherever they may go.

But while I agree with the Senator from California and with this bill in the declaration of principles that is made, I disagree with him in regard to the remedy; and it was upon that point that the committee amended the original bill as it came from the House of Representatives. The bill consists of two parts; first, the declaration of principles; and secondly, the remedy to be provided for a violation of those rights by a foreign Government.

The bill as proposed to be amended by the Senator from California should be somewhat differently entitled. It should be entitled "A bill for the protection of naturalized American citizens abroad," for his amendment is applicable only to cases where citizens are held in prison or arrested abroad upon the allegation that they owe allegiance to the Government that has arrested them and holds them in prison.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg to state to the Senator that that is the body of the bill as passed by the House of Representatives, not my amendment.

Mr. MORTON. As I understand the Senator, he has eliminated from the third section that part which refers to all cases, which is the second clause of the third section; but perhaps I am mistaken about it.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. MORTON. The substance of the amendment of the Senator from California is to authorize the President of the United States, in case an American citizen is arrested and held without justice or good cause, or is unreasonably detained, to seize and hold in prison or in custody a subject of the Government that has thus improperly arrested and held American citizens. For example, if the English Government has arrested and holds in custody an American citizen improperly, in the opinion of the President of the United States, then the President is to have the power to seize a subject of that Government and imprison him for the purpose of compelling the other Government to set at liberty the American citizen thus improperly imprisoned.

My objection to this clause is based upon two or three reasons. First, to seize an innocent citizen or subject of another country and hold him in prison on account of the improper arrest of an American citizen would be an act of personal injustice and outrage. I ask what subject of a foreign Government could come to this country with safety and feel that he was safe here, and in the full enjoyment of personal security as at home, if he is liable to arrest by the President of the United States because an American citizen has been improperly arrested and held in prison in England? What English subject would feel safe in visiting this country or in traveling through it? And then the personal injustice, I might say wickedness, of putting into prison an Englishman in this country who has no knowledge of the arrest that has been made in England, perhaps, has no connection with it, who is entirely innocent of the cause of trouble, is repugnant to modern civilization, and is certainly repugnant to all the principles of personal justice and humanity.

But, Mr. President, there is even a greater objection to this proposition than that; and it is that you put the power into the hands of the President, unrestrained except in the exercise of his judgment, to make war with any other country; you give to the President the power of peace or war. If the President thinks an American citizen has been improperly arrested and detained, he can go to war. He may get a false account. He may have been told that an American citizen has been arrested and convicted in England for words spoken in America, and it may turn out that it is a mistake; but the whole matter is left to the decision of one man, and upon that decision, perhaps, there is a war depending which may cost the lives of hundreds of thousands of men and billions of dollars. It is too great a power to place in the hands of any man. I would not give it to the best President that ever occupied the White House. I say I would not give that power to any one man that ever has occupied the White House, or ever will.

Mr. President, a matter of that kind that involves the peace of two countries ought to be referred to Congress for its determination; it ought to be fully considered and the Senators and Representatives in Congress, after full information and examination, should determine what should be the remedy for the evil, for the unjust imprisonment or detention of the American citizen abroad. Why, Mr. President, what would be the effect? I ask the Senator from California what would be the effect of the arrest and detention of a British subject or of a subject of North Germany or any other great Power if we should seize one of their citizens and imprison him upon such a pretext as that? Suppose now in consequence of the improper imprisonment, as it is alleged, of an American citizen in England we should seize Charles Dickens or any other distinguished British subject, or even a British subject of no distinction, and arrest him and hold him. The British Government has already said to our Government they had good cause for holding the American citizen. We will assume that the President has been in communication with the British Government and the British Government has said, "We had good cause for arresting this man; he has violated our law; and we are only acting in obedience to our laws." After the British Government has said that to the President of the United States, the President disagreeing with it, he is to make the arrest of a British subject here. I ask if the British Government or any other Government would in that case back down and release the American citizen in consequence of the arrest of a citizen of theirs? No, sir; it puts the remedy in the most offensive form.

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend permit me to make a suggestion at this point?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. I understood my friend to use this language: what would the consequence be if we should arrest a citizen or subject of any great Power upon such a pretext as that; that is, upon a pretext that they held one of our citizens in custody and had convicted him without alleging that the cause of the conviction was for acts done or words spoken in the United States. I submit to my friend that that is not a fair statement of the case. The predicate of this act is here succinctly and plainly stated. We are to take nothing for granted. The President is first to ascertain the facts. "Whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested, and is detained by any foreign Government, in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance," not because he is alleged to have committed a crime there, no matter whether it is true that he committed that crime or did not; but denying this right of expatriation, denying our citizenship conferred upon that man and the rights accruing to him. No man will deny, the Senator will not deny, that if there were a case of that kind, this nation must go to war.

Mr. MORTON. As to whether these facts exist on which my friend says the Government must go to war, that depends simply upon the judgment of one man, the President of the United States. Can we intrust that power to one man, a thing about which he may be mistaken? Can such a decision as that be made by anybody except Congress?

But, Mr. President, to proceed with my argument on this point, this bill presupposes that before the President shall take any action he shall have made an effort to procure the discharge of the American citizen in custody.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I submit to the Senator that it imposes no duty whatever upon the President. The bill as it passed the House does not require the President to do a single thing.

Mr. MORTON. I take it for granted that that is what it means; that the President is not to take this rash measure without first attempting by negotiation to procure a discharge of the prisoner. The bill must proceed upon the idea that the President shall first attempt to procure the discharge of the American citizen by negotiation, and after everything has failed then this is presented as the dernier resort, the right to arrest and hold a citizen of the foreign country in custody as a reprisal. Let us suppose that an American citizen is arrested; the President calls upon the British Government to explain the arrest and release the man. Negotiations take place. The British Government explain and say: "We arrested him for a certain cause, and tried and convicted him; we are right according to our laws, and we shall hold him." After an investigation of the question they refuse to give him up. The President says: "You refuse to surrender this man; in my judgment he is improperly detained; I will, therefore, seize and hold a British subject," and he does so. Now, I ask you whether you would expect any Power, whether first class, second class, or third class, after having put itself in this position by negotiation, to surrender the American citizen because one of their own subjects has been arrested? No, sir; no Government could do it honorably before the world, and none would do it. This would be the most offensive form in which the arrest of a citizen of a foreign country could be made by the American Government.

Mr. President, so far from the arrest of a British subject bringing about the discharge of the American citizen that the British Government has persisted in holding in custody after due explanation and negotiation, they would inevitably persist in holding him, and it would lead to war unless we abandoned our position.

Now, Mr. President, let us reverse the case for a single moment and see what we would do under those circumstances. Let us suppose we had arrested a British subject during the war for having conspired to aid the rebels and imprisoned him. The British Government demand his release. We refuse it. We say to the English Government through our minister, "We arrested this man for certain causes; we tried him and convicted him of certain acts of hostility and conspiracy to this Government, and therefore we hold him." The British Government says in reply to that, "You have no right to hold this subject of ours," and consequently they arrest an American citizen in London and put him into a dungeon. I ask you what we would do under these circumstances. Would we let the British subject go, the man convicted and imprisoned according to our laws? No; it would lead to conflict and to war between the two countries.

Mr. President, if it is desirable to get up a war between this country and any great Power I cannot conceive of a better plan of accomplishing that object than to do this. It is a remedy that is sure to bring no relief, because it is a remedy that strikes at the pride of nations, strikes at the justness of their conclusions. As they have already said that they have a right to hold the men they have got, and as they have said that before we take one of their citizens they will say it afterward, and then what comes? They will say to us: "You have arrested a British subject without authority and without right; you must let him go immediately or it is a casus belli." When they say that to us we answer, "No; we will hold him, because you first arrested improperly and hold one of our citizens." What is the consequence? War; there is no other alternative unless one of the parties backs out from its position.

I agree in the necessity of asserting the rights of American citizens abroad, but I am not willing to place in the hands of the President of the United States the power to bring on war in any contingency.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had on this day signed and approved the following acts:

An act (S. No. 486) to facilitate the settlement of certain prize cases in the southern district of Florida;

An act (S. No. 550) for the relief of Robert Ford;

A resolution (S. R. No. 113) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the British-built brig Highland Mary;

An act (S. No. 422) granting a pension to Maria Schweitzer and the minor children of Conrad Schweitzer, deceased;

An act (S. No. 382) granting an increase of pension to Obadiah T. Plum;

An act (S. No. 314) for the relief of George T. Brien;

An act (S. No. 383) granting a pension to John A. Weed and Elizabeth J. Weed, minor children of Robert T. Weed, deceased;

An act (S. No. 175) for the relief of Joseph McGhee Cameron and Mary Jane Cameron, children of La Fayette Cameron, deceased;

An act (S. No. 517) granting a pension to the widow and children of Henry Brown;

An act (S. No. 518) granting a pension to the widow and child of John P. Felty;

An act (S. No. 564) concerning the tax commissioners for the State of Arkansas;

An act (S. No. 547) granting a pension to John Sheets;

An act (S. No. 521) granting a pension to the children of William M. Wooten, deceased;

An act (S. No. 454) for the relief of Samuel N. Miller; and

An act (S. No. 355) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

ELECTORAL VOTES OF LATE REBEL STATES.

Mr. MOORE also delivered the following message:

I am directed by the President of the United States to return to the Senate, in which House it originated, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) "excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized," with his objections thereto in writing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to lay aside the bill regularly before the Senate and take up the joint resolution returned by the President with his veto.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the veto message; which was read, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have given to the joint resolution, entitled "A resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion, which shall not have been reorganized," as careful examination as I have been able to bestow upon the subject during the few days that have intervened since the measure was submitted for my approval.

Feeling constrained to withhold my assent,

I herewith return the resolution to the Senate, in which House it originated, with a brief statement of the reasons which have induced my action.

This joint resolution is based upon the assumption that some of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion are not now entitled to representation in Congress and to participate in the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Having heretofore had occasion to give, in detail, my reasons for dissenting from this view, it is not necessary at this time to repeat them. It is sufficient to state that I continue strong in my conviction that the acts of secession, by which a number of the States sought to dissolve their connection with the other States and to subvert the Union, being unauthorized by the Constitution, and in direct violation thereof, were, from the beginning, absolutely null and void. It follows necessarily that when the rebellion terminated the several States which had attempted to secede continued to be States in the Union, and all that was required to enable them to resume their relations to the Union was that they should adopt the measures necessary to their practical restoration as States. Such measures were adopted, and the legitimate result was that those States, having conformed to all the requirements of the Constitution, resumed their former relations, and became entitled to the exercise of all the rights guaranteed to them by its provisions.

The joint resolution under consideration, however, seems to assume that by the insurrectionary acts of their respective inhabitants, those States forfeited their rights as such, and can never again exercise them except upon readmission into the Union on the terms prescribed by Congress. If this position be correct, it follows that they were taken out of the Union by virtue of their acts of secession, and hence that the war waged upon them was illegal and unconstitutional. We would thus be placed in this inconsistent attitude, that while the war was commenced and carried on upon the distinct ground that the southern States, being component parts of the Union, were in rebellion against the lawful authority of the United States, upon its termination we resort to a policy of reconstruction which assumes that it was not in fact a rebellion, but that the war was waged for the conquest of territories assumed to be outside of the constitutional Union.

The mode and manner of receiving and counting the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States are in plain and simple terms prescribed by the Constitution. That instrument imperatively requires that the President of the Senate "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Congress has, therefore, no power under the Constitution to receive the electoral votes or reject them. The whole power is exhausted when, in the presence of the two Houses, the votes are counted and the result declared. In this respect the power and duty of the President of the Senate are, under the Constitution, purely ministerial. When, therefore, the joint resolution declares that no electoral votes shall be received or counted from States that since the 4th of March, 1867, have not "adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized," a power is assumed which is nowhere delegated to Congress, unless upon the assumption that the State governments organized prior to the 4th of March, 1867, were illegal and void.

The joint resolution, by implication at least, concedes that these States were States by virtue of their organization prior to the 4th of March, 1867, but denies to them the right to vote in the election of President and Vice President of the United States. It follows either that this assumption of power is wholly unauthorized by the Constitution, or that the States so excluded from voting were out of the Union by reason of the rebellion, and have never been legitimately restored. Being fully satisfied that they were never out of the Union, and that their relations thereto have been legally and constitutionally restored, I am forced to the conclusion that the joint resolution which deprives them of the right to have their vote for President and Vice President received and counted, is in conflict with the Constitution, and that Congress has no more power to reject their votes than those of the States which have been uniformly loyal to the Federal Union.

It is worthy of remark that if the States whose inhabitants were recently in rebellion were legally and constitutionally organized and restored to their rights prior to the 4th of March, 1867, as I am satisfied they were, the only legitimate authority under which the election for President and Vice President can be held therein must be derived from the governments instituted before that period.

It clearly follows that all the State governments organized in those States under acts of Congress for that purpose and under military control are illegitimate and of no validity whatever; and, in that view, the votes cast in those States for President and Vice President, in pursuance of acts passed since the 4th of March, 1867, and in obedience to the so-called reconstruction acts of Congress, cannot be legally received and counted; while the only votes in those States that can be legally cast and counted will be those cast in pursuance of the laws in force in the several States prior to the legislation by Congress upon the subject of reconstruction.

I cannot refrain from directing your special attention to the declaration contained in the joint resolution that "none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College," &c.

If it is meant by this declaration that no State is to be allowed to vote for President and Vice President, all of whose inhabitants were engaged in the late rebellion, it is apparent that no one of the States will be excluded from voting, since it is well known that in every southern State there were many inhabitants who not only did not participate in the rebellion, but who actually took part in its suppression, or refrained from giving it any aid or countenance. I therefore conclude that the true meaning of the joint resolution is that no State a portion of whose inhabitants were engaged in the rebellion, shall be permitted to participate in the presidential election, except upon the terms and conditions therein prescribed.

Assuming this to be the true construction of the resolution, the inquiry becomes pertinent, may those northern States a portion of whose inhabitants were actually in the rebellion, be prevented at the discretion of Congress from having their electoral votes counted? It is well known that a portion of the inhabitants of New York and a portion of the inhabitants of Virginia were alike engaged in the rebellion, yet it is equally well known that Virginia, as well as New York, was at all times during the war recognized by the Federal Government as a State in the Union—so clearly that upon the termination of hostilities it was not even deemed necessary for her restoration that a provisional Governor should be appointed. Yet, according to this joint resolution, the people of Virginia, unless they comply with the terms it prescribes, are denied the right of voting for President, while the people of New York, a portion of the inhabitants of which State were also in rebellion, are permitted to have their electoral votes counted without undergoing the process of reconstruction prescribed for Virginia. New York is no more a State than Virginia; the one is as much entitled to be represented in the Electoral College as the other. If Congress has the power to deprive Virginia of this right it can exercise the same authority with respect to New York or any other of the States. Thus the result of the presidential election may be controlled and determined by Congress, and the people be deprived of their right under the Constitution to choose a President and Vice President of the United States.

If Congress were to provide by law that the votes of none of the States should be received and counted if cast for a candidate who differed in political sentiment with a majority of the two Houses, such legislation would at once be condemned by the country as an unconstitutional and revolutionary usurpation of power. It would, however, be exceedingly difficult to find in the Constitution any more authority for the passage of the joint resolution under consideration than for an enactment looking directly to the rejection of all votes not in accordance with the political preferences of a majority of Congress. No power exists in the Constitution authorizing the joint resolution or the supposed law, the only difference being that one would be more palpably unconstitutional and revolutionary than the other. Both would rest upon the radical error that Congress has the power to prescribe terms and conditions to the right of the people of the States to cast their votes for President and Vice President.

For the reasons thus indicated, I am constrained to return the joint resolution to the Senate for such further action thereon as Congress may deem necessary.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1868.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) was read as follows:

*Resolved, &c., That none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral votes be received or counted from any of such States, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized and shall be in operation, nor unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government, and such State shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf: *Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any State which was represented in Congress on the 4th day of March, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not rise to consume time. I have listened as well as I could at this distance from the desk to the reasoning of that message, and I believe that it is perfectly conclusive. I think that the message is one of a great deal of logical power and of truth in its interpretation of the Constitution. I do not doubt that the time will come when most of the gentlemen who will vote on the present occasion to overrule the President's veto and to pass this joint resolution against his veto will themselves subscribe to the truth of this message.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate but a moment. I regard this as one of the most incendiary documents that have ever emanated from the source whence it came. It is in its purpose as well as its tone and style a direct and open declaration that the governments which have been established in the insurrectionary States under the reconstruction acts are utterly illegal and void, and that no votes given for President and Vice President in those States under those governments ought to be counted as legally given for those offices.

But I have one word of praise to utter in reference to this document. It is completely frank, open, perspicuous, and clear. It throws down the glove distinctly to the Republican party of this country upon the issue of the constitutionality and legality of the reconstructed governments of the late insurrectionary States. For one humble member of the Republican party I announce my readiness to meet this issue, and I pick up the glove and we will go to the people next November upon the issue whether these governments shall exist or whether they shall be destroyed by revolutionary means. Let the issue come, sir; it is welcome.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Hendricks, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Vickers, and Whyte—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Dixon, Fowler, Grimes, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Saulsbury and Thayer—9.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 45 and the nays are 8. Two thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution is passed, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

A message was afterward received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House having proceeded, in conformity with the Constitution, to reconsider the joint resolution entitled "A resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized," returned to the Senate by the President of the United States with his objections, and sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives with the message of the President returning the resolution, and the proceedings of the Senate thereon, had Resolved, That the resolution do pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to present to the Secretary of State the enrolled resolution entitled "A resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized," together with the certificates of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, showing that the said resolution was passed by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress after the same had been returned to the Senate by the President with his objections, and after the reconsideration of said resolution by both Houses of Congress in accordance with the Constitution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1439) authorizing the remission of penalties in certain cases; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 354) admitting steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1868.

AFFAIRS IN TEXAS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a letter of the president of the constitutional convention of Texas, communicating the report of a special committee on lawlessness and violence in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1439) authorizing the remission of penalties in certain cases was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 354) admitting steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1868, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, information in relation to the discovery, occupation, and character of the Midway islands in the Pacific ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FOURTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

He also laid before the Senate the following messages from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, in compliance with its resolution of the 9th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, communicating a copy of a paper received by him to-day, purporting to be a resolution, ratifying on the part of the State of Louisiana the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1868.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate, in compliance with its resolution of the 9th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, communicating a copy of a paper received by me on the 18th instant, purporting to be a resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of South Carolina, ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 18, 1868.

The messages were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States is before the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me that the meaning of this bill has been misapprehended, or it has been argued on a hypothesis that gives it a different meaning from what it really has. The first section declares the general doctrine of the right of expatriation. The second section declares that naturalized citizens shall be protected in foreign countries by the Government of the United States in the same manner that native-born citizens are. The third section declares that if, in contravention of the intent and meaning of the first and second propositions, a foreign Government shall detain a citizen, a certain remedy shall be applied. It is said that that leaves in the President the absolute power of peace and war. It leaves in the President no power to apply the remedy, as I understand the bill, except in a given case; and that is where the Government detaining the American citizen sets up a right to do so, because it has some claims upon his allegiance, because it sets up a right to do to him that which it would not do to a native-born citizen of the United States, because it makes a distinction between him and one of our native-born citizens, and denies our right to treat him as we would treat a native-born citizen, or to protect him as we would a native-born citizen. That presents a simple question, and it is this: does the Government of Great Britain, for example, claim to hold a citizen of the United States because he was once a subject of Great Britain? If so, in vindication of our claim that we have a right to protect our citizens everywhere, the President may do what the bill provides. It is no vague investigation that is here provided for to suppose that is doing great injustice to the bill passed by the House of Representatives; and I think the discussion has gone on a wrong hypothesis. The President can only act when the simple question is presented to him whether Great Britain will respect the citizenship of persons naturalized in the United States who were once subjects of Great Britain; whether they will respect, or whether they will deny our claim that they are entitled to the same rights as our native-born citizens. When that case is presented, the President of the United States is to be at liberty to suspend commercial relations, and if there is no other redress to make reprisals. This is simply a declaration that we mean to vindicate the right of an American who is naturalized.

I think if there is anything revolting to every sentiment of justice and honor it is the claim of a Government upon any human being who desires to leave it and become a citizen of another country. That claim of a vested right in human nature should be repudiated indignantly by all Governments. Gentlemen say this bill means war. If Great Britain or any other country feels disposed to make war in the assertion of a right to claim the services of men who were once her subjects, or to claim the power to punish them differently from other American citizens, let her take the responsibility of making war. We have submitted too often to the idea that we must not assert our rights for fear of war. We submitted to it during the civil war; we have been humiliated by it. I am opposed to so much negotiation. I have said on this floor before that I have no faith in statecraft. I have no faith in a vindication of the rights of man over State tyranny by diplomacy. I have no faith in the ability of American diplomats to settle this question. An American diplomat cannot meet foreigners engaged in the same business with advantage; he is not as artful as a man who is trained to the business. I believe it becomes the dignity of this country to declare by law rules by which it is ready to stand, to declare by law that it will protect equally every American citizen, whether naturalized or native born.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I will suppose that we are at war with England, and an American citizen who is liable to draft passes into Canada. In the first place, I want to know if the American Government has a right to forbid its citizens from passing into Canada in time of war with England, and if it should be done, whether we should have a right to hang that American citizen, who should take part with Great Britain against his own country as a traitor or not?

Mr. STEWART. That is not the question at all. It is an extreme case. In time of war, when we enforce martial law and keep our citizens at home for the existence of the State, that is not within the ordinary rules which prevail in time of peace. Then the whole body of the laws on your statute-book disappear before the iron decrees of war, like snow before the sun. This is a declaration for ordinary times of peace by legislation. This is for the Governments of nations dealing with each other upon the terms of peace. It is an act of legislation proposed when there is a state of peace between us and foreign Governments.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I should like to ask one other question. Are not the despotic Governments of Europe virtually camps, standing military camps? That being so, in order to protect their existence they must have standing armies, and the citizens of those countries must be liable to military duty on reaching a certain age. Now, I want to know if the rule, which he admits applies in time of war, does not apply as a standing rule to those military Governments of Europe, and if his objection does not lie against the forms of government which there exist, rather than against the rules of naturalization.

Mr. STEWART. I have not admitted that. The Senator simply put the question to me of a person leaving the country desiring to avoid the draft, presuming that it was not expatriation in good faith. The question put to me was whether a person leaving the country to avoid the draft, and joining the enemy, would be treated as you would treat a foreign subject. I say that is not expatriation in good faith. If, however, a man leaves the country even in time of war, and does not desert to the enemy, it is a very different question. Suppose we should be at war with Great Britain, and a citizen of the United States should remove to Mexico or to France with a view of taking up his residence there, and should become naturalized under their laws, should we have any more right over his person because he emigrated at a time when we were at war with Great Britain when he left in good faith? If he should leave to desert to the enemy it would raise a different question. I undertake to say that if we were at war with any country, citizens of the United States might emigrate in good faith, take up their residence in and become citizens of other countries with whom we were at peace. Of course, if they deserted to the enemy they would be treated as deserters.

But, Mr. President, the general proposition presented to us is this: men have been naturalized in our country under our laws, and the question is whether we shall protect them as we would protect our native-born citizens. I say that the United States has sufficient power to do this, and it is time that their rights were declared by law, so as to have a rule for diplomacy which secret statecraft cannot break down. I do not believe there should be any secrecy about our negotiations with foreign countries. I believe secrecy in those matters is for the weak. It grew up among the weak and jealous nations of Europe when they were trying to cheat each other. We have no reason to conceal anything that this great Government desires to do in protecting its citizens in maintaining its flag. It is inconsistent with republican institutions to have so much secrecy, and if we are to carry on the present system of diplomacy; if we are to have ministers at scores of places where they are not needed, let some rule be prescribed to them which will determine this question definitely and clearly, and let American ministers know that they must protect American citizens.

What does Great Britain do? We are told on this floor this morning that if we arrest a British subject without cause she will declare war, and I believe it. Gentlemen have eulogized Great Britain this morning to an extent that I wish the United States could be eulogized. They say that if we capture a British subject by way of reprisal, in order to get justice done to an American citizen, Great Britain will declare war against us; and gentlemen bring that up as if that was the greatest calamity that could happen to the nation. I do not think it is. I think Great Britain is respected in every part of the world by reason of the manner in which she vindicates and protects the rights of her citizens. Her Abyssinian war is her greatest glory. If we would have the American flag respected at home and abroad, if we would have every American love the flag and rally to its support, let it be the emblem of power; let that flag vindicate every American citizen everywhere. That is the reason why the Roman flag was so much respected; that is why it was such a glorious thing to be a Roman citizen, because the flag of that grand old republic and empire protected its citizens everywhere. Every Briton feels proud because he is protected by the British flag. The American citizen has very frequently to disguise himself as a British subject in many parts of the world, and call himself an Englishman, that he may claim the protection of the English flag. Let the American flag be equally respected. I say that war with Great Britain is a less calamity than it is to let the American people feel that they are humiliated or their rights trampled upon.

But, sir, Great Britain will not declare war. If Great Britain wishes to declare war because she denies the right of expatriation and seeks to punish one of our citizens differently from what she would another—if she is willing to go to war for that, let it be known and she will have the worst of it. Let me tell you that there is no war in which the American people would engage with more feeling and more earnestness and more unity than a war to protect our citizens, native born and foreign alike. They would be a unit on that question, and Great Britain knows it. All we have to do is to assert by act of Congress what the law is and what the law shall be; and Great Britain will concede it, and if she does not concede it she will be in the wrong. When gentlemen tell us that we should not pass laws on this subject because Great Britain disregards the citizenship of our people, and that if we dare lay a finger on a British subject it will be a cause of war on her part, they compliment Great Britain at the expense of the United States!

I do not think there is anything objectionable in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. It presents the simple question, will the nations of the world acknowledge the citizenship of our naturalized citizens. If so, well; but if they dare to deny that, and to demand military service of them or to seize their persons or imprison them, it is a breach of friendly relations. Let that be understood, and you will have the doctrine vindicated. Gentlemen say Great Britain can afford to vindicate the rights of her citizens at the expense of a war with the United States. Let us make this declaration and there will be no war. This bill does not involve the question which has been presented here as to individual arrests for offenses committed in foreign countries. It does not propose to protect men who go to Great Britain and violate her laws, but it denies her right as well as that of any other foreign nation to punish Americans for acts done here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator to explain one clause of this bill. The third section provides that when it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government "in contravention of the intent and purpose of this act upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign," certain steps shall be taken; and then it goes on further to provide, "or if any citizen shall have been arrested and detained whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, &c." Does the expression, "any citizen" there apply to naturalized citizens or to all citizens?

Mr. STEWART. I suppose it means naturalized citizens, because the act only applies to naturalized citizens. It is laying down a rule. The arrest must be in contravention of what precedes, and what precedes only applies to naturalized citizens. I undertake to say it has no practical application to anything else. If naturalized citizens are unreasonably detained after demand for the reason that the Government holding them denies our right to naturalize them, or denies the right of expatriation, then this Government is to interfere. Any other construction would be in contravention of the intent and meaning of the first and second sections.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I ask the Senator if he does not think it would be better to seize the ministers and consuls of the offending Government, inasmuch as they are connected immediately with that Government, rather than to seize private parties who are innocent.

Mr. STEWART. I would like that a little better if it were practicable. I have no respect for statecraft and diplomatic trading. I think very little comes out of it. I would not have much to do with foreign countries except in the way of direct legislation. Perhaps it would be well to take that kind of people first; but I do not believe it will ever come to a reprisal. If we say that we will protect American citizens abroad, that will be the end of it.

I think the amendment of the committee is worse than to strike out the third section altogether. It says that having made these investigations it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to report to Congress all the circumstances of any such arrest or detention, and any proceedings for the relief of the citizen so arrested and detained, that Congress may take proper action to secure to every citizen of the United States his just rights.

In the first place, these arrests may occur and the investigation go on during the session of Congress, and before action can be had Congress adjourns. Then everything must wait until Congress reassembles, and then the papers must be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, a very dignified, deliberate committee, pressed with a great deal of other business. This committee necessarily takes three or four months to examine such a question. By that time the party dies or is forgotten and the case is not reached till Congress is about ready to adjourn, and then appropriation bills and railroad bills crowd us, and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations must make a struggle to get the subject before Congress. In the meantime, the poor fellow who has been arrested, if living, is lying in jail without a remedy, and no person has heard from him for so long a time that the outrage of his arrest has been forgotten.

It is like taking a person who has a claim against the Government under an express bargain for services rendered and turning him over to Congress for relief. We all know how such relief bills are hung up here three or four years before the case is investigated and determined. So it will in these matters. Referring them to Congress without making any demand on the foreign Government for redress is no remedy. It is not Congress that administers remedies; Congress is not the Executive of the nation. We must speak to foreign Governments through the Executive. He is the organ of the nation in such matters. If there is to be any action taken it must be taken by the Executive. Here you propose to say that if foreign Governments arrest citizens of the United States in contravention of the right of expatriation, in contravention of their naturalization by the United States, we will retaliate. It places no special power in the President. It marks out a specific state of facts upon which he shall act. If you are not willing to protect naturalized citizens the same as you protect native-born citizens, if you are not prepared to adopt this principle, do not do it; but if you are, lay down the law, and let the President carry it out. There is loose discretion placed in his hands, as is claimed by those who have opposed the bill. If you are prepared to assert that doctrine you do it in this bill as it came from the other House. I am prepared to assert it.

It is unjust, it is absurd, for a Government to claim that it has any lien on a man born upon its soil. It is in contravention of human rights; it is in contravention of justice; it is a false claim. It is in contravention of the progress and civilization of the age, and it is time that we asserted the true doctrine. I think this bill is important in that respect. The decisions of our courts fall far short of coming up to our political theory, they having borrowed the English decisions. Let the law stand stating the doctrine as we understand and proclaim it. Let it be a legislative declaration. Let us stop looking over English books to find a way to vindicate American citizens against English claims. That is not a very good way to do it. You want a law, a proper law. Let Congress declare the law. Then, unless some nation wishes to do wrong to our citizens, all will be well. And if any nation wishes to make this issue with us, the quicker we meet it the stronger we shall be to meet it, because the stronger we shall be in the affections of forty million people proud and able to vindicate the right anywhere and everywhere.

I think the least calamity that could happen to America would be a war with Great Britain. I want it understood that I think a little brush with England is one of the least calamities that could happen to American civilization and progress, although I hope she will be prudent enough to avoid it, and I believe she will. I do not think there is the slightest danger of her attempting it; but if we do have it I think we shall make some reprisals on account of the Alabama; I think we shall get even with her and set international law right in regard to the capture of Mason and Slidell, whom we had to give up. I think we shall pay off some old scores. She has large possessions at the North, and I do not think that the boundaries of our country will be contracted or the area of the United States become less by reason of the conflict. Particularly shall I feel confident if she undertakes a conflict with the purpose of incarcerating American citizens against the laws of justice and right and against the advancing principles of humanity, which have been proclaimed by the progress of the age.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not insist on the motion if there is to be a vote on the bill; but if there is more debate I will.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays, because I think this bill will stand in the way of other business.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is known that there are some very important messages which ought to be referred. If there can be a vote on this bill I certainly do not wish to prevent it; but if there is to be any further debate, and I presume there is, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harris, McCrocy, McDonald, Morgan, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Vickers, Welch, Wiley, and Yates—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Whyte, Williams, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Corbett, Dixon, Drake, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Kellogg, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Ross, Sausbury, and Trumbull—22.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, and asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. I. DONNELLY of Minnesota, Mr. HORACE MAYNARD of Tennessee, and Mr. LEWIS W. ROSS of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. RAMSEY, it was

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. RAMSEY, Mr. HARLAN, and Mr. BUCKALEW, managers on the part of the Senate.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The message from the House of Representatives also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURNE of Illinois, Mr. W. H. KELSEY of New York, and Mr. G. W. WOODWARD of Pennsylvania, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was—

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. CONKLING, and Mr. DOOLITTLE.

LOYAL CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 1876) for the relief of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of five o'clock having arrived, the Senate, according to order, will take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

MEDICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of the report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8d instant, information in relation to the condition of the appropriation for the publication of the medical and surgical history of the war, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a legal question, and we have nothing to do with it.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 617.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to reduce the military peace establishment of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. Before proceeding with that bill I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to give way to a motion to take up Senate bill No. 256, for the purpose of assigning it for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. DRAKE. What is it?

Mr. HOWARD. The Central Branch Union Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, and others. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill before the Senate, on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, will be read.

Mr. WILSON. It is hardly necessary to read the original bill. Let the amendment which I reported this morning be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following:

That the line of the Army, as now constituted, be reduced to thirty regiments of infantry, eight regiments of cavalry, and four regiments of artillery, such reduction to be effected by consolidation of the regiments of the several arms now in the service; three of said regiments of infantry shall be composed of colored troops, and three of troops of the veteran reserve, and one of said cavalry regiments shall be composed of colored troops.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby authorized and directed, so soon as the public interests and necessities will admit of the same being done, to order the muster out of enlisted men now in service, until the total number remaining in service shall be reduced to thirty thousand, as follows, namely: cavalry, six thousand; artillery, four thousand eight hundred; infantry, eighteen thousand five hundred: Provided, That of enlisted men of the engineer and ordnance departments there be allowed seven hundred, and no more: And provided further, That until said reduction is reached no further enlistments into the Army shall be made, and thereafter there shall be no more than thirty thousand enlisted men in service at any one time, unless otherwise authorized by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the bands now in the service, organized under the provisions of section seven of an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866, except the band at the Military Academy, shall be honorably discharged without delay, and shall receive full pay and allowance to the date of such discharge.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, immediately after the passage of this act, to appoint a board of competent officers, whose duty it shall be to prepare and submit to the Secretary of War a plan for the carrying into effect of the provisions of this act, specifying in detail the manner in which the consolidation of regiments herein provided for shall be effected, and designating from the officers of the line, of the several grades now in service, those to be retained on duty with the consolidated regiments, those to be wholly discharged from service, and those not retained on duty with the regiments herein authorized, whom it is deemed advisable or proper to retain in service. And it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of War to submit said plan for the action of Congress at its next ensuing session, together with the names and rank of the officers to be retained and discharged, and until the action of Congress be had thereon no other action shall be taken on said plan.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act all vacancies occurring among the commissioned officers of the Army, either line or staff, of any grade, shall be left unfilled until otherwise directed by law. The grade of regimental commissary in the several cavalry regiments is hereby abolished; and the lieutenants now holding the appointments of regimental commissary may be assigned for duty to companies of their regiments, and shall fill the vacancies that may occur in their respective grades of first or second lieutenant in the regiments to which they now belong; and nothing herein contained shall affect their relative rank with other lieutenants of their grade.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the grades of regimental commissary sergeant, regimental hospital steward, and veterinary surgeon, are hereby abolished. The number of corporals in each company of cavalry, artillery, and infantry shall be reduced to four, and the said non-commissioned officers shall have the privilege of receiving an honorable discharge with full pay and allowances to the actual date thereof, if they shall so elect, in preference to remaining in the service in such other grades as may be assigned to them by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no bounty shall be paid to a deserter from the Army or the Navy in any case whatever, unless the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, shall previously order the charge of desertion to be annulled, solely on the ground that it had been erroneously made.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That section six of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to deliver to the Governor of each State represented in the Congress of the United States, at the seat of government of such State as many serviceable Springfield rifled muskets of caliber fifty-eight, with accoutrements and equipments complete, as the Governor of such State shall require for the use of the militia therein, not exceeding the number hereinafter specified for each State, namely: Maine, five thousand; New Hampshire, three thousand; Vermont, three thousand; Massachusetts, ten thousand; Rhode Island, two thousand; Connecticut, four thousand; New York, thirty-one thousand; New Jersey, five thousand; Pennsylvania, twenty-four thousand; Delaware, one thousand; Maryland, five thousand; West Virginia, three thousand; Ohio, nineteen thousand; Indiana, eleven thousand; Illinois, fifteen thousand; Michigan, six thousand; Wisconsin, six thousand; Iowa, six thousand; Minnesota, two thousand; Kansas, one thousand; Nebraska, one thousand; Nevada, one thousand; California, three thousand; Oregon, one thousand; Kentucky, nine thousand; Tennessee, eight thousand; North Carolina, seven thousand; South Carolina, four thousand; Georgia, eight thousand; Florida, one thousand; Alabama, six thousand; Arkansas, three thousand; and Louisiana, five thousand; and the same shall be delivered only upon the certificate of the Governor of such State, showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that the regiments and companies for which the same are required are duly organized of loyal citizens of such State under the laws thereof; and said muskets, accoutrements, and equipments shall remain the property of the United States, subject to the control of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment, at least by way of suggestion, to see whether he thinks it is proper. In the fourth line of the first section, after the words "thirty regiments of infantry," I think there ought to be inserted these words: "four of which shall be the four regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps."

Mr. WILSON. The committee's amendment provides for the consolidation of the regiments, and provides that the Veteran Reserve corps of four regiments shall be consolidated, so that we shall have three regiments instead of four, and that will be all-sufficient, and more, too, for it is very difficult to keep up the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. POMEROY. That may be all right. I did not know that fact. I know that a great deal of the service that the Army is rendering at present can be performed by the Veteran Reserve corps, and the men would be paid full pensions if they were not in the Veteran Reserve corps, and on account of these considerations I thought they ought to be retained.

Mr. WILSON. We retain three regiments of them.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator has retained three regiments, I will not move an amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS. Is this the bill No. 6177?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought it was another bill which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs undertook to make a special order.

Mr. WILSON. This is the bill reducing the Army, with an amendment as a substitute.

Mr. DAVIS. When was the amendment offered?

Mr. WILSON. It was offered this morning, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the bill had better be read a third time. We must dispose of it before we can do any other business.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not know until this moment that this amendment was offered to the bill. I knew the original bill had been presented by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I did not know this amendment had been offered until this moment.

Mr. WILSON. I offered it this morning, and it was ordered to be printed with a view of moving it to-night. I will state to the Senator what the modifications are.

Mr. DAVIS. In some of its features it is a very important innovation on the other bill. I have not had an opportunity to look at the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the Senator precisely what it is in a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. I should prefer that the Senator would agree to postpone it until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs were waiting for the House of Representatives to move in this matter, but they have got into a bad condition on their bill, and my object is to pass this bill now, in the hope that we shall be able to get it through. It makes a reduction of twenty-three thousand in the Army.

Mr. DAVIS. There are some important provisions in this bill besides the reduction of the Army.

Mr. WILSON. There are one or two sections in the bill that were not in the original bill.

Mr. DAVIS. The section of the bill that distributes so many arms to the States was not in the other bill.

Mr. WILSON. At the last session we provided that certain States should not have any militia. We in this measure repeal that act, and we provide in the ninth section for allowing the Governors of all the States that are represented in Congress to call for a number of Springfield rifled muskets equal to the number of Representatives in the other House of Congress, one thousand to each Representative. The Governor of Kentucky would have the privilege of calling for nine thousand, Massachusetts would have ten thousand, according to the number of Representatives. We have two and a half millions of these arms on hand at the present time. This is a provision which will enable the States that desire to arm their militia to arm them with a good musket, with a fifty-eight caliber Springfield rifled musket. We have them in abundance on hand, and good arms and equipments.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Clerk to read the ninth section.

The Chief Clerk read the ninth section of the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I had prepared two amendments to the original bill, and I was watching it and waiting for it, expecting the honorable Senator to call it up at some convenient hour, intending to propose my amendments. The amendment that has been offered by the committee was just being acted upon as I came into the Chamber. I do not know whether it was offered as additional sections or a substitute for the original bill. I will thank the Chair to inform me.

Mr. WILSON. This was an amendment to the original bill; an entire amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the provision of this was a separate measure passed by the House of Representatives eight or ten days since. It passed on a Friday or Saturday evening, as I was informed, when there was not a quorum of the members of the House present, when there were very few of the members present, without any debate, without any examination whatever. The objects and purposes of that measure from the House I think are transparent, and I suppose that the same objects and purposes exist now in making it a substitute for the original bill of the committee of the Senate which it has superseded.

Mr. President, we are to have during the coming fall a general election in the United States, a presidential election—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the Chair.) Does the Senator move an amendment to the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I am debating the bill. I desire, and I ask earnestly, not only of the courtesy, but of the justice of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that he will allow this important measure to go over until morning, that I and other members who desire to examine it, may have an opportunity of looking into it deliberately. I had no supposition when the honorable Senator moved to make his original bill a special order for this evening, that that bill would be attempted to be superseded by the measure that had passed the House. I have not had an opportunity of examining, much less to be able to proceed to the consideration of the measure that passed the House and which has been made to supersede as an amendment the original bill of the honorable Senator. I would, therefore, respectfully, but urgently appeal to his courtesy to allow me until morning to have an opportunity to examine the bill. I will be ready at any hour he may designate to-morrow to enter upon such discussion of it as I choose to subject it to. I will move, with the permission of the honorable Senator, to make it the special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that in the ordinary course of proceeding here I would most cheerfully comply with his request. I think he knows that. I am as much disposed as any Senator to give way and accommodate Senators. But at this stage of the session, and with the pressure of other matters, and with the difficulty I have had to get up this bill at all for some days, I do not see how I can consent to do so.

In regard to the section to which he refers, and which seems to be the only objection he has to the bill as far as I can hear, I will state that the House of Representatives passed a bill the other day providing, for the purpose of arming the militia, for the distribution to the States represented in Congress of two thousand stand of arms and muskets for each congressional district and two pieces of artillery with all the equipments in relation to them. I have omitted in this amendment all the artillery and all the equipments connected with the artillery and one half of the muskets, believing that the small distribution made in this bill will be amply sufficient to accommodate the organization of the militia in all the States, and will give the militia in all the States, or most of the militia in all the States, a good first-class arm. There is no danger in it, no difficulty in it, nothing wrong intended in it in any way, I am very sure, nothing that can work any harm to any class in the community. We have a large abundance of arms on hand, and it will arm this number of the militia of the country with good arms. It applies to all the States represented in Congress. Of course, it will not reach three or four States that are not represented, and may not be at present.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general comprehension of the ninth section which I have asked to have read to the Senate. I am exceedingly suspicious of that section. I know of no urgent reason that is a proper one in itself for the distribution of these surplus arms of the United States among the militia of the several States. I do not doubt, as the honorable Senator says, that there is a surplus of arms in the armories and arsenals of the United States, and that a very proper distribution of these surplus arms at a convenient and fit time would be to distribute them to the several States for arming their militia. I concede that there is an appearance of fairness in the general distribution that is to be made of arms among all the States; but to my mind and in my judgment it is entirely illusory; it is a mere mask. All the States are grouped together in order that the ten southern States may be more carefully and effectively covered up in the generality of the measure. To my mind it is perfectly apparent that the real object and purpose of this measure, at least of the ninth section of the bill, is to distribute arms among the southern States, to place them under the control of the Radical Governors of the southern States, to be used by those Governors and their instruments for the purpose of intimidation in the election and to control that election in all those States.

Mr. President, Congress has passed reconstruction laws against the sense of the vast majority of the white people of the southern States. It may be assumed that nine tenths of the white people of the southern States revolt at this congressional legislation. The constitutionality of that legislation has never passed the ordeal of the courts. The President dissents from Congress as to the constitutionality and validity of that legislation; and I have no doubt that a large majority of the white people of the United States are entirely opposed in their judgment to the constitutionality, the expediency, and the soundness of that system of legislation. But as that legislation has been consummated by Congress Congress ought at least to have the justice, the grace to allow to the people of the southern States a fair and free election under the system which Congress has organized and which has been carried out under congressional legislation by the establishment of new governments.

Sir, I cannot wink so hard as not to see, at least to suspect, that the true, I might say the only object of this measure is to put into the hands of negroes in the southern States arms for the purpose of intimidating and driving the white population who, under the reconstruction laws of Congress are entitled to vote, from the polls. You distrust the very system that you have organized. The power that you have created under an arbitrary and unconstitutional legislation you shrink from permitting to go fairly into operation under the deformed governments and measures which you have adopted.

We are about to enter upon a canvass which I suppose will be one of the most exciting and all-absorbing canvasses that ever occurred in the United States. Next fall, after this heated canvass, follows a presidential election, the importance of which in the judgment of both parties has never been paralleled in the history of our country. Is there any reason, are there any public considerations, that require this distribution of arms to take place just as that canvass is being entered upon and before the election takes place? You have your Freedmen's Bureau in full organization and operation in the southern States. In addition to that you have more than twenty thousand soldiers distributed throughout those States. So far as there is any power necessary to repress disorder, to prevent, if you please, the rising of rebels, and to arrest them in their efforts, if they should make the effort improperly to control and influence those elections, is there not an ample force and power in the Freedmen's Bureau and in the armies that are in those States to effect those objects? Why, then, at this stage of this session, without any notice, without any opportunity on the part of Senators opposed to this measure to examine it carefully, and deliberately to present it to the Senate, and to present it to the country—why at this last hour almost of the session spring it upon the Senate and urge it so precipitately through the forms of legislation? Is there any cause that requires that this legislation shall now take place? Is there any sufficient reason for it? If so, let the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs present those reasons to the Senate, and let the Senate have the benefit of his exposition of his reasons of State and State policy that require that this measure should pass.

Why, sir, can we doubt, can human incredulity doubt, that if these arms are placed in the hands of the Governors of the ten southern States, they will be distributed into the heavy Democratic sections in those States and be placed in the hands of men who will use them for the purpose of intimidating Democratic voters from coming to the polls, keeping them away from the polls, and in that way controlling and carrying the election? Are not the military commanders who now hold command in the several southern departments, with their forces, amply sufficient to take care of the peace of the country, the due enforcement of the election laws, or, if you choose, the interest of the Republican party in those States? If it is contemplated that a fair and free election, to be participated in by the persons who under the constitution and laws of those States and the laws of Congress are entitled to vote shall take place, where is the necessity of distributing these arms among the ten southern States? Take, for instance, General Meade, who commands in one of those departments. Has he not an ample force to preserve the peace, to protect the purity of the ballot-box, to keep off disturbers and persons who would bring improper influences to bear upon the election? Has he not force enough and arms enough in his department, and have not all the other generals in their respective departments enough of force and of arms to subserve these ends? Then where is the necessity for passing this measure and distributing these arms?

Mr. President, it seems to me that the leading members of the Republican party in Congress are determined that there shall be a conflict of arms. If they have decided positively and absolutely that there shall be a conflict of arms, they have determined to drive from the polls enough of legal Democratic voters to make it perfectly sure that their party shall prevail in the elections in those southern States. I cannot myself understand what other object there is or can be in the distribution of these arms, at this time, in the southern States. Why, sir, this throwing all the States into a general bill to make each of them the subject of a distribution of arms is a mere guise, a mere mask. If there was not an election coming off this fall in the southern States I have no idea that we ever should have heard of this measure. It is unnecessary for any fair purpose, even under the reconstruction laws.

Will not these military commanders in the southern States see to the interests of their party? Can we doubt that General Meade will? What have we seen in relation to his course recently? A murder occurred at a negro bagnio. General Meade immediately offered a reward of $20,000 for the purpose of the detection of the murderers. Where did he get his authority to offer a reward of $20,000 for the murderers of a man at a negro bagnio? The reconstruction laws clothe him with no such power. The Rules and Articles of War, so far as I understand them, clothe him with no such power. The murderers of a man who was murdered even in such a place, I admit, should be punished; but for a military commander of one of those departments to send abroad in the public prints and on the wings of the wind a reward of $20,000 for the purpose of detecting and punishing the murderers of a man at such a place is certainly a very extraordinary exercise of power.

Well, sir; what took place? Many of the most respectable men in the city of Columbus, Georgia, were arrested by the order of this military commander. They were permitted to go upon their parole, upon their undertaking that they would appear at Atlanta to answer before a military commission for the crime of the murder of this man. They went voluntarily to Atlanta, and surrendered themselves into military custody, and forthwith they were put in cells that were eight feet in length and three feet in width, and with no opening except in the top at this most extremely hot season of the year. Those trials have been progressing. The position of these men was changed by an order from the President and Secretary of War. They were still kept in close prison. Their trials are now progressing to a close, and I see it stated in one of the public newspapers that it is demonstrated to the satisfaction of all those who attend upon the trial or who read the evidence that all the testimony that has been advanced against them has been produced by perjury and subordination of perjury, and that they are bound to be discharged. Sir, this course of General Meade and this cruel and unusual punishment of innocent men, upon charge, before trial, and without any just grounds to impute guilt against them, is one of the remarkable features in the history of our country at this day.

Does the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs intend, and do his friends who pass such measures here design, that there shall only be an illusion, a vain and baseless hope held out to the white people of the southern States of having an election even according to the forms of the reconstruction laws and of the governments that have been framed in conformity to them? If this policy is to be persevered in; if these measures from series to series are to be continued, how long is it possible in human nature to avert again the conflict of arms and the strife of civil war? There is a point beyond which human endurance is not possible. Men even subjugated and reduced to the obedience that the rebels are, may be driven to a point when despair becomes the only impulse and force of human will and of human soul, and when driven by the extremity of their despair with the desperation of men with no hope left in life they may again strike to break the shackles that are now pressing them so cruelly. It seems to me that if it was the deliberate object and purpose of men to force another conflict of arms, a war between the races, the white and the black, the measures which they are pressing from day to day could not with more judgment be devised to bring about that result.

Sir, I raise my protest against the passage of this measure. I know it will not be heeded. Men are drunk with power and intoxicated with the dreams of power. They are wildly careering on in their way of unrestrained and resistless power, in their own judgment. But, sir, there are great laws in human affairs that cannot be always violated. These great and fundamental laws in the affairs of the people of the South have long been trampled under foot, and the step onward ceases not; it falls heavier and faster upon that prostrate people every day. Such a course of things cannot continue forever. It must have an end. It will have an end; and in proportion as it has been pressed with extreme, vengeful, savage injustice and power, will be the recoil.

Mr. President, I have not even read the measure that is under debate. I have not had the opportunity to read it. I did not know that it was to be brought up this evening. If I had I should have devoted a few minutes to its examination, and to understand it as well as I could; but I have not had that opportunity. There has been a haste, a want of due deliberation, a want of respect for opposing political opinions and views in the legislation of this Congress beyond anything that I ever dreamed of; and the informal and hurried manner in which the present bill has been brought up, and the precipitate manner in which it is urged forward, is still an aggravation of that course of measures.

I know that I cannot get time to examine this measure. That has been demonstrated. The decree has gone forth that the measure must pass; it cannot and shall not wait. The supposed exigencies of party are too strong, too imperative to permit any pause. In the Senate of the United States men who represent States whose populations are almost wholly opposed to the measures of the majority here, crying in vain for an opportunity to examine these measures, for time to consider them, to think upon them, to summon up their objections against them, to array these objections and the reasons upon which they oppose them before the country. All this appeal is heeded not. Power, insatiable power, heedless of justice and reason, presses forward, and with inexorable fate passes measure after measure, the whole purpose of which is to enthrall and to enslave nearly one third of the white people of the United States.

Mr. President, I wish I could make a protest of sufficient power and strength against the enormity of this precipitate injustice, but with any amount of deliberation and reflection which I could give it I would be very inadequate to the task, but called upon this late and hurried hour of the session, and of the day I feel wholly incompetent to express the condemnation which my mind and my soul feels, and would desire to express against the passage of this measure.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it has been the practice of the Government from the earliest periods to distribute from time to time among the States arms for the protection and use of the States in such numbers as have been settled from time to time by the law. It is no novelty in the history of the Government; and I cannot therefore understand why it is that the honorable Senator from Kentucky has taken such alarm upon the subject. I see no occasion for alarm whatever. I see no occasion for these indignant bursts of eloquence in which the honorable Senator has indulged.

Now, sir, what can we afford to do in regard to the distribution of arms in the States? Have we on hand a surplus of arms for ourselves more than is necessary for the use of the Government at the present time? That seems to be the simple question to be solved; and in order to aid Senators in forming an opinion on the subject, I beg to state a few facts in regard to the arms we now have on hand.

The number of cannon which are marked as "serviceable" now belonging to the United States is twelve thousand six hundred and ninety-five. Of these thirty-nine hundred and twenty-five are field pieces, seventy-seven hundred and forty-three siege and garrison and sea-coast guns, and one thousand and twenty-nine mortars. The total number of serviceable rifles, muskets, and carbines now owned by the United States is one million four hundred and ninety thousand one hundred and ninety-eight. The whole number of muskets and carbines which is proposed to be distributed by the bill now before the Senate, according to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, would be about two hundred and fifty thousand. The simple question for the Senate is whether the United States can spare this number of muskets, &c., to the States. I think there is no doubt about that. Why should we keep them on hand when we have no use for them, and are not likely to have any use until there is another war. And nobody but the enemies of the country, or those who are in quest of adventure or disorder or insurrection, have the slightest occasion to be afraid of the use of these arms. They will go into the hands of the States, and there they will be preserved, to be used only as occasion may require. I speak in reference to all the States, the insurrectionary States as well as those which are not insurrectionary. It is a simple question of the accommodation of the States in reference to arms. Can we spare these arms to the States? I think we can without incommencing ourselves in the slightest degree.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky assumes the ground that the purpose of the ninth section of this bill is wholly to influence the coming election.

Mr. DAVIS. The immediate object.

Mr. WILLEY. That there is in point of fact no necessity for an organization of the militia in the southern States, and that the object and purpose designed by what he calls this hasty measure, is simply to influence the result of the coming election. Now, Mr. President, I believe there are more United States forces in Texas than in any other State. The Senator says that the United States troops now in the southern States are amply sufficient to maintain order, to preserve the peace, to secure the lives and liberty of the people of that section. I had placed in my hands this morning an authentic copy of an official report made before the convention now sitting in Texas, published by authority of that convention over the signature of seven of its members, headed by that of Judge Caldwell, whose name needs no indorsement here or elsewhere, a man of intelligence and integrity; and I propose, in reply to the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, and to show that the purpose of this bill is not what he declares it to be, to read a few short extracts from that report, and I respectfully solicit the attention of Senators to it. It is not a newspaper report; it is an authentic official report, bearing the sanction of the constitutional convention of the State. The report says:

"In our statistics we have not embraced assaults with intent to kill, rapes, robberies, whipping of freedmen, and other outrages, many of which are found to be most cruel and wanton; such a summation would impose an almost endless task. We have directed our investigations to the homicides committed during the period of time intervening between the close of the rebellion and the 1st of June, 1868; and, from the three sources of information mentioned, we present the following statistics of homicides in Texas:

	Whites.	Freedmen.	Total.
Killed in 1865.....	39	38	77
Killed in 1866.....	70	72	142
Killed in 1867.....	165	165	331
Killed in 1868.....	171	133	304
Year unknown.....	24	21	45
Of unknown race.....	-	-	40
Total.....	470	429	909

making a grand total of nine hundred and thirty-nine homicides committed in Texas since the conclusion of the war, June, 1865, to June 1, 1868, including a few cases casually reported in the present month. This gives an average of three hundred and thirteen per year.

"Of these nine hundred and thirty-nine homicides there were:

By whites—401 whites, 373 freedmen.....	833
By freedmen—10 whites, 48 freedmen.....	58
And by parties whose race is unknown.....	48

"Now, incomplete as they are, these figures tell a frightful story of blood. They represent stubborn facts, which cannot be suppressed by denials or by denouncing them as fabricated for political effect. And whoever attempts it is not only unfaithful to history, not only an apologist for crime, but may be justly charged as an accessory to the wickedness itself, as encouraging and abetting murderers, and as equally guilty with them. We cannot shut our eyes upon these appalling scenes of bloodshed; and instead of attempting to conceal them it becomes us to face them honestly, and address ourselves to the duty of discovering the cause and locating the responsibility of this slaughter of our fellow-citizens."

I shall not go into a recital of the causes here alleged, but I will read a few further extracts:

"There is absolute freedom of speech in very few localities in Texas. Union men dare not generally avow their political convictions. In many places they can hold public meetings only when supported by troops or armed men; and in many others they dare not hold them at all. In several instances their assemblies have been broken up and fired upon, and their speakers ordered to desist. The dominant rebel element will not tolerate free discussion.

"We have been challenged to produce cases of Union men and freedmen being persecuted for their loyalty. We now do so. Judge Black was a Republican—he was murdered in 1867 in Uvalde county by a rebel. Milton Biggs was a Union man, and had been appointed county judge of Blanco county—he was murdered in 1867, while plowing in his field, before he could qualify. Judge Christian, a loyal man of Bell county, was pursued into Missouri and murdered by a party of rebels. Mr. Wade and seven other gentlemen were killed in Lamar county last year for their Unionism. Four men were recently murdered in the county of Hunt, and six in Bell county, for their loyalty. Within the present month the county judge and the district clerk of Hunt county have been driven from their homes and compelled to fly for their lives because of their unyielding attachment to the Government. Hundreds of loyal men to our knowledge are at this time forsaking their homes in Texas, fleeing from the assassin, forced away by rebel intolerance. And we here put it to record that honorable members of this convention are to-day exiles from their firesides and dare not return to their families, for the only reason that they will not forswear their principles. Now, while it remains true that the Union men of Texas constitute a very small proportion of the white population, and while it is true that they are being killed by rebels, is it impossible to escape the conclusion that they are killed for their Unionism. In other words, if they were rebels they would not be killed.

"And when we come to examine the persecutions suffered by the freed people, the mass of testimony is so overwhelming that no man of candor can for a moment question the statement that they are, in very many parts of the State, wantonly maltreated and slain, simply because they are free, and claim to exercise the rights of freemen. Some months ago, in Panola county, a party of whites rode up to a cabin wherein some freed people were dancing, and deliberately fired upon them, killing four, one a woman, and seriously wounding several others. In 1867, in De Witt county, a white man met a black man riding, and asked him what he was going to do with the whip he held in his hand, and on being answered, 'nothing,' shot the freedman, killing him instantly. In the county of Fort Bend, last year, a white man was riding through town, and on seeing a negro man standing on the steps of the office of the Freedmen's Bureau, he drew his revolver and shot him dead. The criminal had never been seen or spoken to by the freedmen before. In Newton county, 1867, a white man met a colored man driving a team; the former made the freedman get out of his wagon, and then shot him seven times in cold blood. In Fort Bend county, same year, the freed people were holding a fair to procure funds to finish their church, and while they were singing a hymn, two white men rode by and fired their pistols into the church. In October, 1867, a white man was traveling in Grayson county and met a freedman; after passing him a few yards, he turned and fired upon him, hitting in the back. The freedman died in a few hours; he had not spoken a word to the murderer—had never seen him before. But a few days ago a party of white men assaulted the family of an unoffending freedman in Falls county, killing one and dangerously wounding another freedman. In the same county a few weeks ago two armed white men, in open day, went to the house of a colored man, and without any provocation murdered him. Soon after this, a white man, in the same neighborhood, rode up to two freedmen, and, without any known cause, shot one of them dead and fired at the other. Last week the colored registrar in Burleson county was found murdered; and in January last the colored registrar of Milam county was called to his door at night and shot. And so the bloody story runs."

And I might read on ad nauseam instances of men seizing black women, cutting their ears off, and letting them run; and yet the Senator from Kentucky tells us that there is no need of an armed militia in Texas; that the United States troops are there in numbers and power sufficient to keep the peace; and this report shows that out of these nine hundred and thirty-nine murderers not thirty-nine of them have ever been attempted to be made amenable to the civil law, running this day at large.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has any one been punished at all?

Mr. WILLEY. Not a single one that I know of. Now, sir, I think it is time to arm the militia, to arm the lovers of order that they may put down these renegades that are ranging through the land in these districts; and there are many men who were engaged in the rebellion, many men who were rebels, who desire to have arms for their own protection and for the protection of the order and peace of society. It is a desire not confined to the black men, not confined to the Union white men, but men of standing and character who love peace and order, and who have property in the community, desire that they may have arms put into their hands that they may maintain order and put down these renegades who are scouring the land from one end to the other, killing wherever they go, destroying property, and keeping the public peace constantly in disorder.

To some extent it is the same case doubtless in all the other States in the South; and if there is any section in the amendment to which I would give my willing assent it would be to the ninth section. I want to see arms placed in the hands of the lovers of order and the peace of society, not alone in the hands of the Union men, not in the hands of the ignorant negroes, but also in the hands of men who were engaged in the rebellion, men who submit, men who love order, men who deprecate as much as the loyal men in many instances these murders and this disorder all through that land. Sir, the United States troops have it not in their power, if they had a commander at their head who had the will to conserve the peace and protect the lives of the people of that locality.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, there is a sting in this section, and I do not wonder that it creates some disturbance in this Chamber. It is not in the fact that arms are to be distributed to the different States; it is not in the number of arms to be given out to the different States; but it is in the fact that none are to be delivered to any State except "upon the certificate of the Governor of such State, showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that the regiments and companies for which the same are required are duly organized of loyal citizens of such State under the laws thereof." I venture to say that if the governments of these rebel States were now in rebel hands we should hear no outcry here against the delivery of arms to those States. I venture to say that if there were nothing in the bill requiring the companies and regiments to which these arms are to be given to be certified to have been organized of loyal citizens of such State there would be no complaint.

And now, Mr. President, I say that the Congress of the United States is justified in passing such a bill as this. I say it with reference to the preservation of the lives of loyal men in those States, with reference to the preservation of order there, with reference to the keeping down of the spirit of rebellion which is as rampant there now as it was four years ago.

But, sir, even if these considerations do not justify the passage of this bill, even if the whole design of this ninth section centered, as charged by the Senator from Kentucky, in the matter of the elections in the southern States this fall, I hold that Congress would be justified in passing the bill. Let us look, sir, at the exact position that things are to assume there. The Congress of the United States has taken steps to secure the elective franchise there to all men without regard to race, color, or previous condition; and in every one of the States that have been organized under the reconstruction acts the right of suffrage in the black man is guaranteed. The white rebels of those States are determined to overthrow that right which Congress has secured to the black man. If they cannot take it from the black man constitutionally they are determined to drive him by force from the polls this fall. Everything that we hear from there, taken in connection with the outgivings of the late Democratic convention in New York, pronouncing all our reconstruction proceedings unconstitutional, null, and void, and the denunciation of those proceedings by their candidate for the Vice Presidency, and his open declaration that it is the duty of the President to overturn all the reconstructed State organizations by force, all goes to satisfy and should satisfy the country that violence and revolution in these southern States is the determination of the Democracy. Now, sir, I say that while Congress has any power remaining over this subject, it is bound by the most sacred obligations to put in the hands of the loyal men of these southern States the means of protecting themselves against the rebel whites; and if we go hence and adjourn this Congress without doing that thing, we are recreant to the trust which the loyal people of this nation have put in us. Sir, I would just as soon, so far as I am concerned, have it written at the head of this bill that the arms to be furnished to these southern States are intended to protect the loyal men of the South at the ballot-box at the coming election, as to have it bear the title the committee has given it. For one, I do not fear to meet these issues exactly as they have been made up for us by the rebels and the Democracy. We are dealing with rebels. The world knows that we are dealing with rebels. Every Senator in this Chamber knows that we are dealing with rebels. Why should we not deal with them as rebels should be dealt with? Why should we not deal with them by force of arms, by powder and ball if need be? Sir, if I had my way I would arm every loyal man in the southern States with a Springfield rifle and all necessary equipments, and with cartridges ad libitum, and they should have the opportunity of teaching rebels and traitors there, though the loyal man's skin should be black and the rebel's skin white, that there is a power in this country that can keep down rebellion, not only when it is armed and organized on the field of battle, but as well when it takes the shape of the midnight murderer and the prowling assassin, dealing death in wanton malignity and cold blood to men who love their country better than the rebel cause, for which their slayers would have sacrificed that country.

Now, Mr. President, it is no use mincing words about this matter. If the Senators here from the States where they have had no rebels do not know how to deal with rebels, there are Senators here who have been among them and know all about them, and knowing them they know how to deal with them, and they know there is but one way to deal with them, and that is to crush them down under the hand of power.

I would give the loyal men of those States arms, four, five, six, eight, ten, twenty times as many as this bill provides for if there were a necessity calling for it. Then, sir, we should see how it would be, whether the whole South is to become a Texas, whether in every State in the Union it is to be a daily thing that murders most foul, such as shock the sense of humanity of the whole race of mankind, are to continue to be perpetrated.

These remarks, Mr. President, I have deemed fit to make here in regard to the general features of this ninth section. I close what I have to say with calling the attention of the honorable chairman of the committee to an omission in this ninth section which I suppose was entirely accidental. I call the honorable chairman's attention to the fact that he has not considered it worth while to give any muskets to Missouri.

Mr. WILSON. I will say in reply to that remark that since the Senator rose to his feet I have found, to my utter surprise, in glancing over the bill, Missouri was left out. I was going to move the amendment if the Senator had not discovered it.

Mr. DRAKE. I supposed it was an inadvertence. I move to amend the ninth section by inserting in the eighteenth line before the word "Kansas" the words "Missouri, nine thousand."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The bill has been reported to the Senate, and the amendment made in Committee of the Whole as a substitute for the original bill concurred in. Amendments adding to the bill are still in order. The bill in this stage cannot be amended by taking anything from it; but as this is an addition, the Chair conceives it to be in order. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from West Virginia gave us a very horrid story of a most fearful number of murders that have been committed in the State of Texas. Now, the Freedmen's Bureau pervades that State, at least all portions of it where there are any considerable number of negroes. Besides that, there are in that State between five and six thousand soldiers of the United States Army, if I recollect the statement made a few days ago by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLEY. I will say to the Senator that nearly all those troops are on the borders to protect the State from Indian depredations. There are very few in the inhabited part of the State.

Mr. DAVIS. There is an ample military force in the other southern States to spare as many men as may be needful for the protection of every part of Texas. The Freedmen's Bureau is a perfect organization, and it is, by the laws which organized it, sustained by the whole of the Army of the United States. The honorable Senator from West Virginia complains that there is not a proper commander for the department of Texas. Whose fault is that? The General of the Army can change the department commander at his pleasure.

Mr. NYE. I guess not.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, he can.

Mr. WILSON. No, he cannot.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, if that commander was in any degree in default in the performance of his duty, have not the Congress of the United States the power to provide a remedy? They have all power; at least they exercise all power; and the power of changing a department commander they could put into requisition about as quickly as a juggler would presto change, if necessary. Sir, I care not who is the commander of that department. The General of the Army has authority to control and give military command to any officer or soldier in the Army of the United States as well in Texas as everywhere else.

The honorable Senator runs up this bloody catalogue to between nine hundred and a thousand murders, and says that not one of the murderers has ever yet been punished.

Mr. WILLEY. To my knowledge.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator's informant, the pamphlet from which he reads, does not give him information that any single murderer or criminal has been punished. Now, Mr. President, when martial law prevails throughout Texas, when the will of the military commander is the law, when the Freedmen's Bureau is backed by that military law, by all its officers and powers, and is required by the act of Congress to be sustained in all its movements, in all its execution of the law regulating the Freedmen's Bureau by the Army, it is the height of credulity, of superstition, for human nature to believe that there could be nine or ten hundred such atrocious murders and not one of them be punished. Sir, the honorable Senator is a man of refined and noble sensibilities. A tale of horror, however fictitious and unfounded, awakens in his sensibilities so much revulsion as to run away with his judgment. It is utterly impossible, it cannot be in the nature of things, that there could have been in the State of Texas near a thousand such diabolical murders. With the Freedmen's Bureau pervading and controlling and governing the whole population wherever it was established, it being established in every portion of the State where there was a negro population; with five thousand armed soldiers there under the lead or at least subject to be instigated by all the Radicals in that State, who are spread over the whole of its surface, more or less, and who have always been ready and willing and desirous to give information to the Army and to the Freedmen's Bureau of these atrocious and bloody crimes, that there should be near a thousand of them perpetrated and not a single offender brought to justice beggars human belief! I care not who indorses such a story, whether it be Judge Caldwell or Judge anybody else; the thing is not so; it is impossible; it cannot be; it is not within the compass of possibility, much less probability. I have acquaintances in Texas, and I have received in the course of this session of Congress three or four letters from different points in that State, and those letters uniformly represent to me that there is as much order there, as much observance of law, as much of security of person, life, and property, as prevailed in that country before the war.

Sir, I have heard a great deal of these fictions about bloody outrages upon negroes by white men during the last three or four years. My own State has been the occasion of many of them. I recollect that a certain General Clinton B. Fisk, who commanded in the city of Lexington at one time, wrote a letter and made a public speech, which was afterward published in the Gazette and Commercial in Cincinnati, who spoke of twelve negroes who had come into the city of Lexington mutilated, the ears of some cut off, their noses mutilated, their backs made raw with chastisement, they suffering an extent of cruelty that was shocking to any nature. That whole story was investigated, and it was found to be entirely destitute of every vestige of truth. There was not a fact or syllable of evidence on which to base it; it was false, unconditionally, absolutely false. I have seen accounts of these alleged acts of cruelty scattered almost epidemic over the South, more than sporadic cases, and when they came to be investigated they were found to be most immensely exaggerated.

Why, sir, if this Congress, possessing the absolute power of government in Texas and in all the southern States, the absolute command of all the armies and navies of the United States, of the military force of the Republic, of the Freedmen's Bureau, of every agency that could be commanded—if it, having the absolute and unquestioned command of the whole, permits three years of such bloody outrage to elapse in one State with one thousand victims of murder, atrocity, and bloodshed, the power ought to abdicate its throne and give up its charge into other hands; it is so inadequate, so incompetent to perform and to execute its powers that it ought no longer to be trusted with them. But, Mr. President, these tales of horror that come,

"Thick as autumn leaves
That strew the brooks in Vallambrosa," are nothing but the figments of excited imagination, or the diabolical machinations of adventurers, of men who wish to raise tales of horror in order to madden the mind of Congress and the country, that they may carry along that Congress and country to their own ambitious schemes of power. I know what credit to give them; they are entitled to none.

Mr. President, I knew that the veil could not be kept spread over this unholy scheme. It has been torn aside, and the audacity and the atrocity of the project are revealed to the Senate and to the nation. It is nothing more nor less than to distribute the arms of the United States over the ten southern States, to place them in the hands of negroes and the adventurers who lead the negroes, and who will marshal them at the polls on election day for the purpose of keeping away Democratic voters. You may succeed, and probably will succeed, in this next step; but outrages may become so thick and so atrocious upon human rights that common humanity will rise up in opposition to that. I think the policy and the destiny of this party is fast approaching that atrocious excess. I am in hopes that even this fall will see it brought to a close; at least I hope so, and I believe so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the bill has been ordered to a third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been. The question is on its third reading. The bill is still open to amendment by way of addition.

Mr. DAVIS. My recollection is that the bill was read the third time; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no; the Senator himself rose when that question was about being put.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the question was put by the preceding incumbent of the chair, and that I addressed the Senate upon the question of the passage of the bill; but in that I may be mistaken.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator rose just before the question was to be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, in all previous distributions of arms from the beginning of the Government they have been distributed according to the Federal ratio and according to the representation of the States in both Houses. This distribution is to be according to the representation of the States in the House of Representatives alone. This is a departure from the uniform custom of the Government. I move, therefore, that two thousand be added to the quota assigned to each State, the two thousand being for the two Senators of each State.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been done always in every distribution of arms heretofore.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see any use in that.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been the uniform practice of the Government, and the reasons for it are very obvious. We have our State governments to support if we are small, and we require more in proportion than larger States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If they really need them in Rhode Island to defend themselves against Dorr or anybody else, I shall not object.

Mr. ANTHONY. We made very good use of them when we had them in the Dorr rebellion and that other rebellion of which Dorr's was the prototype.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I have no objection to an amendment which shall introduce the Senator's rule of distribution, especially if it has been the practice of the Government heretofore; but I am opposed to his amendment as increasing the total number of muskets to be distributed.

The whole number to be distributed in the adhering States, (and by that expression I mean those which were represented in Congress during the war,) as I make it out, will be one hundred and eighty-six thousand. The number to be distributed in the States which were engaged in rebellion are, Tennessee, eight thousand; North Carolina, seven thousand; South Carolina, four thousand; Georgia, eight thousand; Florida, one thousand; Alabama, six thousand; Arkansas, three thousand; Louisiana, five thousand; making forty-two thousand to be distributed in the insurrectionary States as they were formerly known. The amendment which the Senator from Rhode Island proposes of two thousand more muskets for each State will make over seventy thousand additional to the number already contained in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The aggregate at present is two hundred and twenty-eight thousand. By the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island the number will be raised above three hundred thousand.

Now, Mr. President, one aspect of this subject has not been discussed. I suppose that these arms being once distributed by the United States will never be reclaimed, will never be restored. They are now, I suppose, under good management, in good care, in the Government arsenals, under proper officers, honorable men engaged in the public service and paid out of the Federal Treasury. They will be preserved if kept where they now are, and will be available for public use hereafter if any emergency in our affairs should arise. By being distributed among the States in this pell-mell manner, without reference to the necessities of any State, but upon a principle of general distribution, I suppose in a great many of cases they will fall into hands that will take very bad care of them. Many of the States have but indifferent arrangements for the preservation of arms; their arsenals are badly managed. The practical result will be to turn over arms which are declared by this amendment to be "serviceable" (they must be serviceable and therefore good arms) into care and management and control much less efficient than that which they will have if retained by the United States. That ought to be considered.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to say that we have on hand nearly two and a half millions of arms and some thirteen or fourteen thousand cannon, and we propose to sell any quantity of these arms to anybody, and I suppose we should sell hundreds of thousands of arms if we could get three dollars apiece for them. We are going to sell what we can of such arms as will soon be useless. These arms are good arms at the present time; but we have over a million of this kind of arms. We have an immense quantity of arms, and the States, North and South, need them and desire them for the purpose of arming properly their militia. I know this to have been the case, for we have been pressed before this time for an increased distribution of arms among the States.

Mr. BUCKALEW. As I understand, a large part of the arms now held by the United States are unserviceable.

Mr. WILSON. There is a portion that are; but we have over a million of good arms on hand, and about two and a half millions of different kinds. We have seven or eight hundred thousand Enfield foreign rifles. I take it we should sell a good many of them if we had a chance.

Mr. WILEY. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether his attention has been attracted to the provision in the ninth section by which these arms are to be distributed "when required" by the Governors of the States. It is not necessarily imperative.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I repeat that a large part of the arms held by the United States are unserviceable. As to those this amendment will have no effect. The distribution to be effected, as the amendment reads, is of "serviceable, Springfield rifled-muskets, caliber fifty-eight, with accouterments and equipments complete." I believe we have made some provision by law for the sale of arms. When the rebellion broke out, very suddenly, we sent abroad to foreign countries and bought arms largely. Our haste was such that we bought what we could get, and for that reason we got a considerable number that were unserviceable. I think, perhaps, much blame was attached improperly to those concerned in making foreign purchases at that time. They acted under pressure, the pressure of an unexampled emergency; there was no leisure for making careful investigation of foreign muskets, and obtaining the best article; much less was there time to wait for the manufacture of arms abroad, and thus to obtain them of a good quality. Doubtless at the end of the war the amount of arms on hand that were unserviceable was amazing in amount, considering the whole number that were purchased and in the use or under the control of the Government during the war. What we are concerned with now, however, are Springfield muskets that are serviceable and in good condition, and it is with reference to them that this amendment is to operate.

Now, if we have a large quantity of arms that are serviceable, that are marketable, that can be used in this country or in foreign countries, I take it for granted there would be no difficulty in selling them. Let the Government sell these arms abroad. If we have this supply for foreign markets, doubtless there will be demand made on us, and we can sell any surplus or unnecessary arms we may have under our control. In fact, as I said before we have made provision by law for the sale of arms, and the War Department has now complete control over the subject and can dispose of those which need not be kept on hand.

The Senator from West Virginia says that these arms are to be distributed only when called for. As a matter of course, if you propose to distribute arms gratis to the States, if you propose to distribute valuable arms without charge to the States, I suppose they will call for them; they will be willing to accept this princely donation, to receive these arms as their property, at least for the time being. Of course they will do that; and as I said before, I take it for granted that none of these arms will ever be restored. It will be virtually so much lost to the Government of the United States. They may be used for parade purposes. We do not anticipate any war soon to come upon us. They can only be used for parade purposes, for ornamental purposes, for purposes of drill and instruction, for which very valuable arms I suppose are not indispensable; but the practical result will be that the Government will never have any of them restored. So far as we are concerned they will be an entire loss.

I do not understand that the Government prior to the war was in the habit of distributing arms among the States.

Mr. CONKLING. Always.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I may be mistaken in that. I can very well understand that when the militia are called into the service of the United States we should arm them. At all events, whatever distribution took place in former times must have been on an exceedingly small scale.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that there was an annual appropriation for the distribution of arms among the States, and $200,000 was the annual sum.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That would furnish only a small amount of valuable arms.

Mr. ANTHONY. But it was every year.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have not heard of any demand from the States for these arms.

Mr. THAYER. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that each new Territory has received its quota of arms. I recollect that Nebraska the very first year of its organization received two thousand stand of arms before there were five hundred people in the Territory.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I can very well understand that in the Territories they had need of arms on account of Indian hostilities, besides any demand for militia drill and instruction. Mr. President, until there appears to be a demand from the States for these arms I think we had better retain them in the care of the United States, and if we have any larger number than we need let us sell the surplus. This is a pretty large distribution; and now the Senator from Rhode Island proposes to increase the number more than seventy thousand.

Mr. MORTON. The matter stands in this way in regard to the southern States: there is perhaps not a house or cabin in all the South that does not contain from one to half a dozen rifles or muskets. Every rebel down there is armed; they carried home their arms with them from the war, while the negroes are not armed as a general thing, or have but few arms. The new State governments have no arms and they have no money to buy arms with. The state of the case, then, is that the whole rebel population is armed; the loyal population is not armed, and the new State governments have no arms and have no money to buy arms with. Now, I would submit it to my fair-minded friend from Pennsylvania, whether under such circumstances the new State governments should not be provided with arms?

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is not this amendment. Here are but forty-two thousand in all those States, including Tennessee, and no provision is made for Virginia, for Mississippi, or for Texas.

Mr. MORTON. I will come to that. I am now making the point that the new State governments surrounded by a rebel hostile population that is fully armed have not a single musket or piece of artillery to protect themselves against that population. No man, it seems to me, can say that these new State governments ought not to have arms unless he desires that they shall be pulled down by the rebel population by which they are surrounded.

Now, Mr. President, the issue is made; it is made by the New York convention, and I will say with perfect respect to the distinguished and venerable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] it is made here to-night that the new State governments there shall be upturned by violence. The New York convention declared that those governments have no foundation in law, that they are not entitled to the obedience of anybody. That convention, by its platform, has in substance said that it is the right and the duty of the white people of the South to overturn those governments. We have the frank declaration of General Blair, which was indorsed by his unanimous nomination only two or three days afterward, that it is the duty of the Democratic party, if it comes into power, to overturn those State governments by force of arms. On this issue presented by the Democratic party North and South, and these new State governments being without arms, I ask if it is not the duty of this Government to arm these new State governments? Why, Mr. President, the venerable Senator from Kentucky to-night presented the same issue. He told us that the white people had borne and endured until endurance had ceased to be a virtue, and that they could not and would not submit much longer. Did not the venerable and distinguished Senator say a little while ago that they could not and they would not submit to what he calls tyranny much longer? Therefore we are informed even upon the floor of the Senate that rebellion against these new State governments is imminent down there, and being thus informed, and these new governments being unarmed, it is but the part of common, ordinary prudence to provide them with the means of defending themselves.

Mr. President, so far as sending arms to the northern States is concerned, there is not much use in that. There was much force in what the Senator from Pennsylvania said on that point. I know from observation and experience that in the northern States the arms are not taken care of to a great extent; they pass into the hands of companies and into the hands of municipal corporations, and they are suffered to become rusty, and to get out of order, and are stolen and carried off, and very little account is ever taken of them afterward. They ought not, in my judgment, to be sent in large quantities to the northern States unless the Government first has assurances that those States have arsenals in which to put them, and laws under which they will be taken care of. But so far as the southern States are concerned, the newly-constructed State governments should be armed. They will take care of the arms for their own self-protection. They will put them into the hands of the loyal militia, and they will thus protect themselves, and they will thus keep in subjection, notwithstanding what the Senator from Kentucky says, that rebel population by which they are surrounded.

The venerable Senator talked about the oppression of the white people. He described it as the most terrible oppression that any people had ever been subjected to. I inquire what that oppression is? It is this and nothing more: that a small part of the white population has been disfranchised for having committed perjury by taking an oath to support the Constitution and afterward gone into rebellion. They are not disfranchised from voting, but simply prevented from holding office. That is the terrible oppression never before equaled in the world's history which the white people of the South are subjected to! I know it is a terrible oppression to some people if they cannot be permitted to hold office; but here is only a small number who are excluded from the right to hold office; and that is described as an oppression so terrible that they cannot and will not submit to it much longer, but will rise in open rebellion and overthrow the new State governments erected under the acts of Congress!

There is another oppression to which they are subjected that is grievous, too grievous to be borne; and what is that? That the colored people are permitted to enjoy along with the mass of the white people the right of suffrage and the right to hold office; not that it is taken from the white people, but that these men are allowed to enjoy it along with them. That is such a grievous oppression on the part of the white people that poor human nature cannot stand it much longer!

Mr. President, these things are gravely put forth upon the floor of the Senate of the United States, and we are warned that the time is rapidly approaching when there will be no longer submission to the Government of the United States, but that the people will rise up and assert the rights of the white man. In view of the declarations of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in view of the declarations of General Blair, his candidate for the Vice Presidency, in view of the platform laid down at New York, I submit that there is an imminent and an immediate demand that the State governments of the South shall be fully armed, and thus enabled to protect themselves.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall vote for this bill, but for reasons somewhat different from those assigned by other Senators. I do so mainly because it has been the custom of the Government for the last fifty years to furnish arms to the different States—a custom which I have always believed to be a good one in many respects. It not only furnishes our people with arms, but by this means they are taught the use of arms. I do not believe we lose anything by the distribution of the muskets and cannon that are sent forth. The consequence of doing it is to teach everybody the use of the musket, the cannon, and the rifle. After a while the weapon becomes worthless and is thrown by, but it does not become worthless until some improvement has been made in the arm, and when the old one would no longer be useful. Our arms were not scarce in our arsenals at the beginning of the war because of our militia taking them, but because the gentleman who occupied the place of Secretary of War under Mr. Buchanan rifled all the arsenals and sent the guns into the southern States to be used by the men there when they were ready to rebel. At the beginning of the war this Government had here but three hundred muskets of all kinds we have now over two millions. Every five or six years we are making improvements in that arm, and now the whole world is agitated with the improvements upon the breech-loading gun. If we send out these guns the people in the southern States will be supplied with them, the negro as well as the white man, for the negro now has become a man, and for the first time in his history he will be furnished with a gun and be enabled to learn its use. To be sure, some of them did learn its use pretty well and did pretty good execution upon the rebels during the war; but now every negro, old and young, will be permitted to use his gun and to learn its proper use, and when we have another rebellion we shall not have difficulty about men in that section of the country.

Pennsylvania has been receiving guns for more than fifty years from the General Government, and it is in some degree to that supply that she owes the martial spirit of her people. Every boy of seventeen becomes anxious to join a volunteer company; he does not consider himself a man until he has had a gun put on his shoulder, and then at once his ambition is excited, and he becomes a soldier. After a while, he becomes tired of it; but when war comes the spirit which was taught when young is ready to induce him to serve his country. All these guns are just now useless in our arsenals, and I think we ought to supply them to the States, and we ought to treat these southern States which we have reconstructed as we have all the other States, give them a supply for their troops, and I cannot imagine why anybody should refuse to them so small a boon as that.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kentucky stated that the veil had been torn away from this atrocious measure, and that it now stands in all its deformity before the world. Well, sir, I do not fancy that it required a very high degree of sagacity on the part of the honorable Senator from Kentucky to perceive on the reading of this bill that it really looked to certain contingencies in the future, on the happening of which it might be very proper that the loyal governments of the insurrectionary States should be provided with arms to defend themselves.

Now, sir, the issue presented to the country at the present time in the position assumed by the Democratic party is a very simple one. It has been stated and restated in this Chamber repeatedly. It is simply this: the destruction and utter overthrow of the reconstructed governments of the insurrectionary States existing under the reconstruction acts of Congress. That is the issue on which they propose to go to the people; and if I understand their policy correctly, it contemplates the violent overthrow of those governments by force of arms or by some other means.

Mr. President, let us take a practical view of this subject for a moment. Here are double governments in each one of the insurrectionary States. The elder in point of time is what is known as the Johnson governments. Those governments, as announced in the President's veto which we have had before us to-day, are recognized by him as the only legitimate and constitutional governments in the rebel States, while in this document he states with great frankness and clearness that he regards the reconstructed governments of the rebel States as utterly devoid of constitutional authority, as utterly illegal in themselves.

Now, sir, suppose this Democratic policy shall be attempted to be carried out in the insurrectionary States. Suppose that a rising shall take place in the course of the coming fall in one or more of those States on the part of the friends and abettors of the Johnson governments; suppose they really take a step toward bringing forward this war of races, of which we have heard so much; suppose they disregard entirely the reconstructed governments and refuse obedience to their laws, what then happens? The State is in a condition of insurrection; there is a rebellion existing in the State; one or the other of those two governments will necessarily apply to the Executive of the United States for aid in maintaining the peace and executing the laws of the Government. Suppose the application should be made by the Governor of a reconstructed government to Mr. Johnson, now the President of the United States. Under the doctrine which he has announced to-day in his veto message he would be under no obligation at all to employ the Army of the United States for the purpose of upholding that government. On the other hand, according to his own doctrines, here solemnly announced, he would refuse to employ the Army to put down such an insurrection; he would let it pass; he would say to the southern rebels engaged in this insurrection to overthrow the reconstructed government, "Proceed; you are acting only according to the Constitution and the laws; it is your right to hold and exercise the powers of Government there, and it is not the right of the reconstructed government to do so, and I will not interfere at all, and I will by no means afford any aid to the reconstructed government." Then, sir, what would be the condition of the latter description of government it is very easy to see. That government and its friends throughout the State, black and white, would be at the mercy of the insurgents, and the Government would have no remedy whatever at the hands of Johnson.

Now, sir, I propose to keep my faith toward the governments which we have launched. I propose to place in their hands the means of defending themselves; and if there shall be any attempt on the part of Johnson's governments to usurp the powers which the reconstructed governments have derived under our legislation, it is our duty by all the means in our power to enable those governments to defend themselves. Sir, it would be base, indeed, in Congress in such an exigency to withhold from the governments which they have created those means which are necessary to perpetuate their existence. I should be ashamed of myself in such an exigency not to place arms in the hands of these governments, and I would, as the Senator from Missouri has remarked, put down such an insurrection by means of powder and ball, and every other means known to the laws of war, whatever they may be.

Sir, let not the Democratic party suppose that the Republicans are so weak and feeble that they dare not stand by the creatures which they have launched into existence. Do not let them lay to their hearts the flattering fiction that there is any fear of consequences on the part of that great and patriotic party in this regard. We are prepared to meet every exigency, whatever it may be, in whatever shape it may present itself; and I hope that we shall not shrink from the plain duty which is thus imposed upon us to enable those governments to defend themselves against domestic insurgents and against the policy of Johnson, and the policy of the Democratic party as now fully revealed and understood. If they want war, they can have it; we will not shrink from the contest whatever responsibility of blood or treasure it may require. We shall stand by our policy and defend the governments which we have launched into being. For these reasons, sir, I would vote even to double the quantity of arms in the southern States. If it is desirable to launch a war of races, let those who are fond of that kind of amusement undertake it as soon as they please. I am prepared, and I think the loyal people of the United States, North and South, will be as ready for that bloody contest as those who are now attempting to promote it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, Pierce was elected in 1852, and the men who afterward seceded then held possession of the Government and of all its powers. In 1856 Buchanan was elected, and the same men continued in possession of the Government and of all its powers. In 1860, when Lincoln was elected, the people of the United States proclaimed that they intended to have a change of rulers and of men. These secessionists would not submit to the public judgment; they revolted against it; and because they could not continue in possession of the Government, with all its vast patronage, they raised rebellion, they rebelled against the judgment of the majority of the people of the United States, of their countrymen; and sooner than submit to the domination of the voice of numbers and the majority, and the transfer of power from themselves to those who had superseded them at the polls they chose to make the conflict of arms in the form of rebellion. Mr. President, the Republicans made war against the rebellion rightfully, constitutionally. They made their manifesto of war in what is called the Johnson and Crittenden resolution. That is a noble document; it is true in constitutional principle, in patriotism, and in wisdom; and it was that noble manifesto of purposes and principles that enabled the party then in power to lead captive the minds and the hearts of the American people. In pronouncing that manifesto, and in striking according to its principles for the assertion of the authority of the Government, the Republican party acted the part of true and noble patriots. If they had adhered to their platform, to the immortal principles that glow and burn and illuminate the words of that resolution, they would have still held the heart and the mind of the whole country captive. But they were corrupted by power, as all parties are corrupted with the possession of power; they became selfish, ambitious, arrogant, dominating. They forgot duty to country in their devotion to self and to power; they turned upon the Constitution of their country which they had unfurled upon their banner in the onset of the battle; they struck down that Constitution and all the rights and liberties of the people under it that stood in opposition to them.

Mr. President, I am devoted to the Constitution, to order, and to law. I worship no force and no power but the force and the power that are embodied in the Constitution and in the law. When the party drew the sword to uphold what is involved in those immortal words I gave it my adhesion; but when the party who thus unfurled its banner makes it but the pretext of faction, of ambition, of party, and of personal aggrandizement; when they move forward to trample upon the great principles of the Constitution and the rights and liberties of the people as secured by that Constitution, I turn against them, I care not who they are.

Mr. President, your party in the enunciation in the Johnson and Crittenden resolution of the purposes for which it waged war against the rebellion won, as I stated, the hearts and the confidence of the country, and deserved it; but when it forgot the objects for which it was making the war against the rebellion and turned its forces upon the Constitution of its country, upon the liberties of its people, upon that heritage of freedom which was won for us by our fathers, then it was that it lost the confidence of the country. Like the secessionists when they had become unpatriotic and had forgotten public duty, and the people turned against them and demonstrated that they desired a change in their rulers, the Republican party became unwilling to surrender power, and to retain power it was guilty of usurpation, revolution, just as the secessionists had been.

In the early days of the war under the noble principles of the Johnson and Crittenden resolution, that party made secessionism and rebellion odious, hateful, detestable; but they came to commit so many enormities themselves, so many outrages upon their country and their Government, so many flagrant violations of every great principle of liberty guaranteed by the Constitution, that they are beginning to make rebellion itself comparatively respectable. Yes, Mr. President, it was your party, your leaders, your counselors, your policy that have at length made rebellion comparatively respectable. You have wrested from the hated features of secessionism much of their odium, much of the horror with which they were contemplated by the people of the country. How and why? By your own abuses of power; by your own excesses in the uses of power; and when you had thus turned the public judgment and the public voice against you as the secessionists had in 1860 and thereabouts, you, like them, became unwilling to yield power even into the hands of the people who had reposed it in you, and you, like the rebels and the secessionists, were willing to make revolution, to trample under foot the Constitution and all of its sacred principles sooner than yield up to the people that trust of power which they had reposed in you. Sir, you have become revolutionists, rebels; you have deposed from their position the secessionists; you have subrogated them, and you have done that to assume yourselves a parallel position of revolution, of oppression, and of usurped power. The voice of the reason and virtue of this nation is overwhelmingly against you, and demands of you to yield up the Government and all of its trusts. You are not willing to do so, and sooner than submit to these terms and these requisitions of the people, you have been willing to overthrow, and you have practically overthrown, our whole system of Government; you have brought it into ruins; it is now lying around the country in disjected fragments; and when it will ever be reconstructed and rebuilt up as the sages and patriots who reared it in 1787 founded it, is a problem of the greatest difficulty.

Mr. President, I think you will find that as the people would not tolerate the secessionists in 1860, so now in 1868 they will not tolerate you, another set of revolutionists, in your great and ruinous revolution, more so than the secessionists themselves, because they sought a simple separation, a separation by a straight line, but you bring our Government and our Constitution with all its great principles, and all the partition and adjustment of sovereignty and powers between the United States Government and the States, into one common ruin. You are willing to yield up the whole, to surrender all sooner than let go your firm, as you believe, grip upon power and place and office. But I think, Mr. President, that you will find that the people will now in 1868, pass the same stern, irreversible, and inflexible judgment against you that they did against the secessionists. I hope so; I believe so.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to add to what I said before a calculation of the cost of this distribution. The whole number of arms to be distributed under the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, with the addition of nine thousand for Missouri, since made, at fifteen dollars for each musket with accouterments, amount to $3,420,000. I am told that the value of a Springfield musket now is about twenty-five dollars. These are required to be serviceable muskets with the fixtures and matters that go with them, but I have put the calculation at fifteen dollars. The cost of this distribution at that rate is, as I have said, $3,420,000. Under the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, counting two thousand additional to each of thirty-seven States, we have seventy-four thousand, which, at fifteen dollars each, amount to $1,110,000 more, making the aggregate $4,530,000, carried by this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as it is now proposed to be amended by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. President, within the insurrectionary States, as they were formerly mentioned in this amendment, forty-two thousand are to be distributed by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, the value of which would be $630,000. The Senator from Rhode Island would add to that number sixteen thousand for eight States of the South included in the amendment, which, at the same rate, would make the aggregate distributed to the southern States $870,000. That is the cost to the United States of this amendment. Before taking the vote upon it, I thought it proper to add to what I said before this statement of the amount of cost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to offer to this bill some amendments; one to the first section of the bill to reduce the number of regiments to twelve regiments of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, and four regiments of artillery, so as to have the whole amount twenty regiments, which I think is quite enough for the peace establishment of this country. Ten regiments of United States troops are enough, so far as the disorders in the southern States are concerned, and ten regiments are enough to take care of our forts and arsenals and look after the Indians.

In relation to the third section of the bill, I think the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has gone too far in proposing to abolish all the bands.

Mr. WILSON. It only applies to brigade bands.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The section reads:

That all the bands now in the service organized under the provisions of section seven of an act entitled, &c.

Mr. WILSON. Those are brigade bands.

Mr. CONNESS. The regimental bands were abolished some time since, I understand.

Mr. WILSON. When the Army bill was passed in 1866, the Senate refused to allow bands, but the House of Representatives persisted in not interfering with them, and finally the Senate yielded in a committee of conference. I think at the last session we passed an act through the Senate to repeal the law authorizing bands, and I think we have done it at this session, but it has not yet become a law. They now have regimental bands, but brigade bands are entirely unnecessary, and it is proposed to repeal the law authorizing them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the section simply refers to brigade bands, I shall not object to it; but I think it is going too far to abolish all bands in the military service, especially in time of peace. I desire, however, to amend the first section of the bill, so that it shall read:

That the line of the Army as now constituted be reduced to twelve regiments of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, and four regiments of artillery.

And then to go on as it now reads. Then I propose to amend the second section so as to reduce the total number in service to thirty thousand men, divided thus: cavalry, three thousand; artillery, four thousand eight hundred; infantry, twelve thousand two hundred; and to let the remainder of the section stand as it is, simply changing "thirty thousand" in the twelfth line to "twenty thousand."

This bill as it stands leaves the standing Army in time of peace at forty-two thousand men. Mr. President, this is too large an Army for any service which is required by the Government of the United States. The bill provides for thirty regiments of infantry, eight regiments of cavalry, and four regiments of artillery, making in all forty-two thousand men.

Mr. WILSON. But the bill provides that there shall be but thirty thousand men.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Thirty thousand enlisted men. It is well known, and especially in these latter days, that our regiments cost us at the rate of about a million and a half a year, making the expense of thirty regiments about forty-five million dollars. If we have an Army of twenty thousand, it certainly is large enough in time of peace; and if any emergency should arise, war with any foreign Power or a domestic insurrection, we know with what alacrity the armed and trained soldiers of the country, for we are now a trained and military people, would fly to the standard of the Union. We could raise any amount of troops in the shortest possible time which could become necessary by any exigency, and twenty thousand are enough for any peace establishment.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to go into the general discussion which has arisen to-night. Certainly I shall not do so at any length. I regret exceedingly that anything should be done by Congress or by anybody which would tend to bring about a war of races in the southern States. That there is great danger that such a war may arise is certain: No man can look upon the state of things at the South and not feel the danger. There are some of the States of the South where not only all the men who have held any office under the State or under the Federal Government are disfranchised, but where by the oaths which are required to be taken in the constitutions of those reconstructed governments three fourths of all the white people in those reconstructed States are disfranchised. Take the State of Alabama; the oath in the constitution requires a man to swear that he believes and accepts the political equality of whites and blacks. In Arkansas it is the same. Now, I say to the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton,] that a large majority of the white people of Indiana would be disfranchised if they went into either of these States to live, and so would a large majority of the people of New York, and of all the States with the exception of one or two where they have ever been called upon to vote on that question. This must be the result unless you intend that the people shall be demoralized and shall perjure themselves and shall take oaths which they cannot take before God without taking perjury upon their souls.

But, Mr. President, when such a state of things as that exists, to suppose that it can continue for any length of time without coming to a conflict is folly. This system must give way or a conflict will inevitably ensue. Not many years ago General Grant, who is now the candidate of the Radical party, was of precisely the same opinion which I still entertain; and in the State of Wisconsin, when these questions were being discussed, he authorized me to state to a convention held in Wisconsin and to the people of Wisconsin that if this system of reconstruction was to be persevered in, the whites disfranchised and universal negro suffrage set up in the States of the South as a condition of reconstruction, it would inevitably lead to a war of races unless we maintained a standing army there to prevent it.

Mr. THAYER. What convention?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I allude to the State convention held at Madison in the fall of 1865; and subsequently General Sherman was there at a meeting held in the assembly chamber at Madison, and General Sherman sat by my side when I addressed the people of Wisconsin assembled there and urged the same view, and stated the fact which General Grant had authorized me to state, and General Sherman authorized me to state the same thing, and he nodded his assent as he sat by my side. Gentlemen, I tell you that you feel conscious of the fact yourselves, and you believe that enforcing this reconstruction on the South in this way will bring us to a point where there may be a war of races unless you arm the negroes of the South to prevent it. You feel it; you fear it; you know it is inevitable unless the Government of the United States prevents it by the strong hand.

Now, Mr. President and fellow-Senators, I hold that it is much safer for you to rely upon the Army of the United States, commanded by the regular officers of the United States, to preserve the peace during the coming elections than it is for you to put arms into the hands of one of the parties in those States, and not put arms into the hands of the other.

Mr. MORTON. Are not the others armed?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not that I am aware of; no more than the opposite side. When the rebels surrendered, their arms were surrendered, for by the condition of Johnston's surrender to Sherman the arms were to be brought forward to the State arsenals and there delivered into the custody of the United States; and I have no knowledge about the other party being armed at all. There are no more arms that I am aware of on one side than the other. But what I protest is that the most dangerous of all things you can do is to put these arms into the hands of one party in the midst of an excited election and suppose that that is the way to keep the peace. No, gentlemen; let the arms which are to be held in those States in which these elections are going on be held in the hands of the United States soldiers, commanded by the United States officers, and not the officers who may be chosen by these militia or the Governors, or the men who are interested in maintaining one party to the disadvantage of the other. There is the danger; and you will find in practical experience here will be the most dangerous thing to result from arming the one side. If you do anything on the subject toward keeping the peace during the pending election let it be done by the power of the Federal Army, the officers of the Federal Army. Give your directions to them to hold an even balance, and let them hold it with a firm hand, and not arm the negroes of the South, supposing that will be the better way to preserve the peace.

Mr. President, and fellow-Senators, I do not want any blood shed in the South. I wish to avoid it. I would plead with you and appeal to you by every consideration to prevent it; and if there is danger of a conflict in the coming elections down there, let the force which is employed to prevent it be the force of the regular Army, under the control of the officers of this militia which may be organized by a faction or a party for the purpose of preventing the other party from coming to the polls to vote. Let it be the Army of the Federal Government, holding an even balance and an even hand in those States. That is the way to prevent a conflict. But you arm one party, and what is the necessary effect? Is it not of itself one of the greatest provocations that can be conceived to arm one party—a great provocation to the other to be drawn into a conflict? These people are liable to abuse their power, to drive men from the polls who claim that they have the right to vote under the laws that are established. If they attempt to go to vote they are driven away, perhaps. In the excitement of the moment a collision occurs; and if the war begins God only knows what may be the end. My opinion is that this bill in this respect is exceedingly defective, and that if you wish to do anything for the purpose of preserving the peace at the coming elections there, it should be through the regular Army and not by any volunteer militia.

Mr. President, I do not undertake to say that the men in the South who have had control of these reconstruction measures have not done as well as human nature is capable of doing when it is clothed with such extraordinary powers as have been placed in their hands. I do not think that the generals who have been in command in the South are any worse than ordinary men. Many of them are high-minded and honorable men. But, sir, it is the system of which I complain. The system which puts absolute despotic power in the hands of any man tends, of necessity, to corrupt to a certain extent the man. The possession of absolute, unqualified power is a specific poison which works a change in the human heart itself. In consequence of the system, not that the men are worse than other men, there has grown up at the South in many of those districts a system of oppression which you cannot find paralleled in the history of civilized countries for two hundred years. The Senator from Kentucky alluded to one occurrence which has taken place in the State of Georgia. A Mr. Ashburn was murdered, murdered, I believe, in a house of ill-fame, a negro brothel in the city of Columbus.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I state to my honorable friend from Massachusetts that he is mistaken. Such was the fact stated to me by a gentleman who resides in the town. He knows the place where this murder occurred.

Mr. CONNESS. That does not appear in the testimony at all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But that is not material to the point I was stating. I only state it as a fact of which I am informed by gentlemen residing there.

Mr. DAVIS. It is the fact, and I know it by men who live in Columbus and who have been here.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On his being murdered a reward was offered of $40,000 for the purpose of discovering the murderers; and to show you, sir, what kind of a system of oppression can grow up whenever the common law is laid aside and absolute military despotism is substituted in its place I would refer you to certain facts that have occurred there. In that city of Columbus a man when he left his home at breakfast did not know whether he would return to his home again or not. Time and again men in that city were arrested without warrant, without any charge, taken to Atlanta, thrust into dungeons but eight or ten feet long and two and a half or three feet wide, with no light and no air except what came through the grates at the top, kept in those dungeons for a whole week without being permitted to speak to a human being, and at the end of the week taken out and by these detectives told, "Now, sir, tell us what you know about the murder of Ashburn. Forty thousand dollars reward has been offered to detect and to find out who were the murderers. If you disclose the fact you may participate in the reward." "Sir," said two or three of these gentlemen, and their names were given to me by the person who made the statement, "I know nothing of the murder of Ashburn." "Yes, you do, sir;" and thereupon they were thrust back into the cells again for another week.

One of these men, a young man residing in the city of Columbus, who was a man of full habit, quite fleshy, weighing two hundred pounds, was in this hottest weather placed in one of these cells, and when his counsel, Mr. Crawford, of Georgia, formerly a member of the House, whom the honorable Senator from Massachusetts must well know, called upon him, he found him stripped down to his undershirt, and the reason was asked why he did this. Said he, "I receive one pitcher of water in the morning; that water I pour over my floor with the exception of just enough to quench my thirst, and I take off all my clothing down to my undershirt and lie upon the floor where it is wet and damp, and put my face down to a crack beneath the door where I can catch a particle of fresh air." There he was kept suffering for a whole week, and then taken out again by these detectives and inquired of what he knew of the murder of Ashburn?

I hold in my hand an affidavit made by a colored man, who was also persecuted in the same way, in order, by this system of torment and persecution, to wring from him, if possible, something, some story, some tale in relation to the murder of Ashburn. He states the fact that he was arrested and taken from his team which he was driving through the streets; that he was hurried off from one place to another, and finally to Fort Pulaski; that in Fort Pulaski, after he had been placed in a dungeon for awhile, he was placed in that instrument of torture which is denominated a sweat-box, and kept standing in it for thirty long hours, when he was taken out and again asked, "What do you know of the murder of Ashburn?" These detectives, acting, not under the common law which gives us our liberty and secures our rights, but acting under the military despotism which grows out of this system, have in Georgia, in our own country, under the authority of the reconstruction laws of Congress, or rather by an abuse of the power which that authority has given, subjected persons to a persecution equal to the boot, equal to the thumb-screw, in order to force from them some confession of their knowledge of the murder of Ashburn. This colored man, after being blindfolded, was taken from his dungeon and led round and round until he was bewildered and lost, and was brought up at last in front of a loaded cannon with a man ready to pull the string and fire it, and threatened that it should be fired upon him if he did not disclose something about the murder of Ashburn!

Mr. President and fellow-Senators, I tell you that in the name of these military despotisms in the States of the South there have been enacted such cruelties, such oppressions, such wrongs as would make the heart weep and bleed to hear recited. I do not say that the generals in command there are not just as good men as any of us would be under the same circumstances; but when absolute, despotic power is placed in the hands of any man over the lives and property and fortunes of all the men and women around him, black and white, it is utterly impossible that this kind of oppression should not grow up. It is its natural fruit and flower, and has been from the beginning of the world. It is in human nature and human affairs that wherever this despotic power exists and is exercised without limit and without restraint, just such oppressions as these always occur.

Mr. President, I could wish that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts had provided, if that be the object of the bill, and there are gentlemen who frankly avow that such is its object, to arm somebody in the States of the South so as to preserve the peace at the coming election, that the regular Army of the United States, under the officers of the Army, should be employed for that purpose rather than that arms should be sent to be placed in the hands of one party to keep the other party in subjection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, when this bill was taken up, I certainly expected that the Senate would pass it in the course of half an hour. I am sure it entered not into my mind that we were doing anything very wicked in passing this bill, and I am not a little surprised at the tone and temper of the debate that has so unexpectedly sprung up.

What is the proposition? It is to reduce the Army from fifty-three thousand to thirty thousand men—as large a reduction as it is safe to make at this time, and in the present condition of the country. The Senator from Wisconsin desires that the Army shall be reduced to twenty thousand men. Sir, that would be a reduction quite down to the Army standard before the war. Then we had eighteen thousand men, or rather we were authorized by law to have that number. We have in nine of the rebel States about fourteen thousand men. We have in the State of Texas only fifteen companies, excepting on the frontiers. In the whole State we have fifty-four hundred, but there are only fifteen companies in the eastern part of the State. In the States of Mississippi and Arkansas we have but thirty-one hundred; only twenty companies in the State of Mississippi. Our Army is mostly west of the Mississippi river, in the Indian country, scattered all over the whole Union, and to reduce that Army from fifty three thousand to thirty thousand men is an immense reduction at this time and is all that it is now safe to make.

The Senator from Wisconsin asks why we do not rely on the regular Army to preserve the peace in these rebel States? Sir, the very proposition we have before us is to reduce the regular Army. We are completing, as we hope, reconstruction on the basis of justice. We hope to see speedily law-abiding governments established there. Most of the Army will be removed from those States. Perhaps a small portion may be retained for a time. These States desire to organize small militia forces. It is right and proper that they should do so. Everybody supposes they will do so. This distribution of arms to all the loyal States that desire those arms and have the need for them can be made by the Government without any loss to anybody. In a very short time the very best arms we have will pass out of use and new breech-loading rifled muskets will take their places. We are already arming the Army of the United States with breech-loading muskets, and these Springfield muskets will soon cease to be of any great account.

A word about the despotism in the southern section of the country. Sir, there has been more protection of the liberty of the whole people in those States within the last fifteen months than in any other period during the last twenty or thirty years; but still there are great outrages committed. Who commits them? Who murdered Ashburn? Why was he murdered? Simply because he was a member of the constitutional convention; because he was canvassing the State. He was driven out of the public hotel and was not permitted to stay there on account of the fact that he was known to be a member of the convention and an advocate of the policy of reconstruction. He went to a private house to board. Gentlemen speak disrespectfully of it. I am told by those who have investigated the subject that there is not a word of truth in the charges made that his boarding-house was a ill-house of fame. It is, it has ever been the practice of the assassins of loyal men to assassinate the character of their victims.

In regard to the arrest of these persons charged with his murder it is possible that some things may have been done that should not have been; but I have read, within a few days, a letter signed by those prisoners held in custody at Atlanta, saying that they have been treated with the greatest kindness by the officers. That letter, signed by the men on trial, is full, ample, complete, and it gives the lie to all these charges of cruelty.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if any complaint has been made either to the General of the armies or to the Secretary of War of the conduct of these subaltern officers in command there?

Mr. WILSON. I have not heard of any. I do not know whether there have or have not been complaints made.

Mr. DAVIS. Complaint was made to the Secretary of War, and he sent a special messenger there.

Mr. HOWE. When was that?

Mr. DAVIS. Soon after their confinement.

Mr. HOWE. How long since?

Mr. DAVIS. A couple of weeks ago.

Mr. HOWE. And he sent a messenger there to investigate the matter?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly he did. The father of one of the young men came here from Columbus and stated the facts.

Mr. WILSON. I remember that. The father of one of the young men asserted that he was not guilty, and that he was not treated as a gentleman should be. The truth is that it was an organized murder, in which several persons were engaged. There is no question or doubt about it at all. There is no doubt about his being murdered; there can be no doubt that several men were present and participated in the murder; there can be no doubt these men were inspired by political hate, and that they acted in concert. Some of these men have been arrested, are now on trial before a military commission at Atlanta, and it is no matter of surprise that persons in sympathy with them should seek to defame the military authorities and all those who would bring these political assassins to justice. But I am anxious for a vote, Mr. President, and will trespass no longer upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. HARKLAN. I desire to say a few words before the vote is taken on this bill. I am very much surprised at the character of the arguments that have been presented from the other side of the Chamber in opposition to this bill. I have listened here for many months to able arguments from that side of the Chamber in favor of the reduction of the standing Army and its entire withdrawal from these States South. It has been insisted upon by Senators who have participated in the discussion to-night, that only a few thousand men were needed, and they merely to garrison the principal forts and to hold in subjection the savages on the frontier. This course of reasoning has been urged with such pertinacity, and facts in favor of it have been presented with such clearness, that I had become convinced that we had more troops in the regular Army than were now needed, and I was hoping that the time would arrive previous to the adjournment of this session of Congress when the Army might safely be reduced. In conversation with members of the Committee on Military Affairs I learned that it was their purpose to introduce a bill to reduce the Army as soon as civil governments could be substituted in these States for the provisional governments previously in existence.

That time has now arrived, six or seven of these States having organized regular governments in harmony with the Constitution and the laws of the United States, when it is no longer necessary, as they think, to retain on foot so many regular troops, and they propose consequently to reduce the Army between twenty and thirty thousand; and so soon as his proposition is introduced into the Senate every member of the Senate of opposing politics that has spoken deprecates the reduction. They have denounced the presence of the troops in those States as an organized despotism, a despotism that had grown too onerous to be borne; and when the majority of the Chamber propose to withdraw the troops, now that civil governments have been organized in harmony with the Constitution and the laws, they denounce the withdrawal of the troops. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin tells us that it is unsafe to withdraw the regular Army.

It is known to everybody that if the regular troops are withdrawn it will be necessary to have arms in the hands of the militia for the purpose of sustaining the civil officers. It frequently happens in each and all of the States that criminals organize in numbers too great to be overcome by the civil officers, the officers of the courts; that they must occasionally be sustained by a posse or an armed body of men in order to execute the process of the civil tribunals. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, now that he is about to reduce the Army and withdraw a large proportion of the regular troops from these States, proposes to make it possible for the civil governments to execute the civil process of the civil tribunals in those States; and that has been assailed as a criminal proposition, as a proposition to arm one political party against another political party. After giving the bill as careful a reading as I am capable of giving it, I see nothing in it that tolerates such a suggestion. The bill proposes to place these arms in the control of the civil governments in those States, and not under the control of any party. They are to be delivered to the Governors regularly elected by the people and inaugurated, in the hands of the men who have become by virtue of the voice of the people of the States over which they preside the commanders-in-chief of their militia, the men who are intrusted with the execution of the State laws. All that there is in that part of the bill is to place a few thousand stand of arms in the hands of the chief Executive of each one of these States, in order that a few men may be armed to support the civil officers of the State, to make it possible to execute civil process, to overcome any small combination of criminals who may have a purpose to interfere with the private rights of citizens.

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin denounced the Army as a tyranny, as a despotism, and cited cases of despotism on the part of officers, and in the same breath told the Senate that he was in favor of continuing those same troops in those States; that it would be much safer to keep these despotisms organized in the midst of these people that have been, if we may believe these Senators, ground to the earth by this despotism. I do not understand this kind of logic. It is either wise or unwise to keep a standing army in those States. We have been told during this long session of Congress that it was unwise by every member sitting on the opposite side of the Chamber of opposing politics; it was unnecessary; that they were not needed. Some of us thought that possibly they might be necessary until civil governments should be established; but those governments having been established, we now acquiesce in the wisdom of reducing the Army, withdrawing the regular troops, and permitting the civil governments to control their own local affairs; and in order that they may be able to do this and sustain themselves it is proposed to make a general distribution of arms, to send a few thousand to each one of the States of the Union, to place them under the control of the chief Executive of each State; and now that is denounced, and each one of these able and learned Senators has been attempting to convince the Senate and the country that the majority in this Chamber are more unwise in now acceding to their proposition to reduce the Army than we heretofore have been in maintaining a small regular force in those States.

I do not understand this kind of logic. It is incomprehensible to me. I know it is the privilege of the minority to criticize the policy adopted by the majority of a deliberative body. But it does seem to me that they ought to study a little consistency in presenting these criticisms, and not denounce to-day that which they sustained and defended yesterday.

I am willing to vote to reduce the Army to the smallest number which it is supposed will be able to maintain the peace on the frontiers, to garrison our principal forts on the two coasts, and to permit each organized State in the Union to control its own local affairs in its own way. In order that this may be done it seems to me that we ought to follow out that policy which has existed from the very beginning of the Government, to make a distribution of arms from year to year to the several States, to be placed in the hands of their local militia, in order that they may be able to enforce their local laws.

It is said that some white people have been disfranchised in the southern States, and that some colored people have been permitted to vote. Why, Mr. President, let us analyze that proposition for a moment. In the first organization of civil government there Congress provided that all loyal citizens of the proper age and proper residence should be permitted to vote, but so soon as the State organization was effected the power to control the elective franchise was remitted to the States themselves, and Congress does not now claim the right to control the elective franchise in South Carolina more than in Iowa, in Georgia more than in Wisconsin. They now have constitutional State governments. They are organized, and adopting the theory of the Democratic party, that the people of each State have the right to regulate the elective franchise for themselves, Congress permits their fundamental law to go into effect. They provide in their constitutions and in their local laws who shall vote and who shall not vote, and Congress acquiesces in it when adopted by the people of South Carolina just as Congress acquiesces in the same thing when adopted by the people of Wisconsin. If under the constitution of Wisconsin certain white men are disfranchised what right have I to complain? And some of them are disfranchised in that State by local law, as they are in mine and in every other State in this Union. Persons who have been convicted of crimes, whether white or black, are disfranchised in the most of the States. This is done by virtue of the local laws, either the fundamental law, or some statutory provision. If it is true that in South Carolina, or in Alabama, or in Georgia, or any one of these States, under the constitution of the State which the people themselves have made, certain classes of white men are disfranchised, what right have I to complain? Why should the Senator from Wisconsin feel offended? Have they not a right in those States to regulate their own local affairs in their own way? Is not that right as complete in those States as in the States North and West? If they are ever to be coequal members of this Union, they must become so the very moment they are entitled to full representation in both branches of Congress.

I repeat, then, Congress has never proposed to stand as the guardian to the people of the States that are organized and living under regular State governments. They have only maintained the right to enable the people to organize, and at the first election to be held pursuant to this attempt to organize have indicated who may vote. The people have held that election, have organized, and under that organization have made for themselves constitutions, and are enacting State laws regulating the elective franchise, as well as every other subject of local interest to themselves; and what right have we to complain if they do enact laws that are not palatable to us? They have a right to enact those laws. We must guaranty to them the same privileges that we claim for ourselves.

But this question, as it seems to me, is not legitimately before the Senate. All that is proposed by this bill is to reduce the standing Army, to accord the very thing that our associates here of opposing politics have been demanding at our hands from the beginning of this long session of Congress up to within the last twelve hours, to reduce the Army, and to make it possible for the people of all the States to enforce their own laws by the use of their own citizens, to support the civil officers and these State governments in the execution of civil process.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend the bill in section one, line four, by striking out "thirty" and inserting "twelve;" and also, in the same line, by striking out "eight" and inserting "four;" so that it will read:

That the line of the Army, as now constituted, be reduced to twelve regiments of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, and four regiments of artillery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair will state that this bill is itself an amendment. It was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was then reported to the Senate, and that amendment was concurred in. It is not open to amendment; but if there be no objection the Chair will not make the point of order.

Several SENATORS. There is no objection.

Mr. STEWART. The point of order is not raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER proceeded to put the question on the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the yeas and nays are insisted upon, I make the point of order on the proposition.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is too late to make it.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I insist that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is certainly too late to raise the question of order now, after the amendment is before the Senate, and being voted upon.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator will permit me, I believe a few moments ago we voted on an amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CONKLING. That amendment was to add to the bill. This is to strike out and change it after we have agreed to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to take the yeas and nays on this question. I think we may just as well take the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear what the Chair says on the point of order first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair of course must decide—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But the question is submitted to the Senate, and we are taking the vote upon it, and are now dividing on the question.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, hardly that. Some of us sitting here for a number of hours patiently listening to speeches, all of them most pertinent to this bill, of course, were willing by unanimous consent that the sense of the Senate should be taken on that amendment, supposing it to be in the ordinary way, by voice, and the Senator was to be content with that; but now, if he wishes to divide the Senate, and show the lack of a quorum, if there is such a lack, then unanimous consent might not be given. My friend before me [Mr. WILLIAMS] makes the point of order, and I hope the Chair will decide it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the gentleman assumes that there is no quorum present, then we have nothing to do but adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not say there is no quorum present. I say if it should turn out that there is no quorum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am satisfied that there is a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the Chair decide the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Oregon makes the point of order, of course the Chair decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question was submitted, and the Senate was dividing upon the question; and it is too late to raise the point of order. I do not ask a division of the Senate for the purpose of showing that there is no quorum. There is evidently a quorum in the body. I wish simply to have the vote by yeas and nays. I do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. CONNESS. Has the Senator any doubt as to what the decision of the Senate was upon his amendment?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to have the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask if the Senator has any doubt as to the decision of the Senate?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senator from California if he does not wish to place himself on the record by yeas and nays!

Mr. CONNESS. I do not wish to please a Senator who is simply aiming to gain political points.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not aiming at political ends. I am for reducing the Army to twenty thousand men.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this debate in order after the question has been decided?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With all respect to the Chair, I wish to say that after the question of order was once waived and the amendment agreed to be submitted, and the vote is being taken, it is too late to raise the question of order.

Mr. STEWART. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that discussion on this matter is not in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for information from the Chair if it be not too late to raise the question of order after the question has once been waived and the amendment submitted to the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. That is just what he has decided.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; he has not decided that. He said the question originally was out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order can be made at any stage. The question before the Senate is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. VICKERS. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question is on the amendment I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair? The Chair decides that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand the decision of the Chair upon the amendment. The Chair did not announce any vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that the amendment was not agreed to, there being no point of order made. After that the point of order was made, and the Chair decided that the amendment was not in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for a division of the Senate upon the question.

Mr. CONKLING. How can that be if it is out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be taken by unanimous consent.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Wisconsin appears to die hard. What is the matter with him?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It seems these gentlemen do not dare go on the record.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, I guess they dare go on the record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be entertained if there be no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. There is objection. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being interposed it cannot be entertained. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add to the ninth section the following proviso:

Provided, That the arms, accoutrements, and equipments provided for in this section shall not be delivered to the Governors of the States as mentioned in this section prior to the 1st day of January next, unless the President of the United States shall deem such delivery necessary for the suppression of disturbance or disorder in any of the said States.

Mr. VICKERS. Mr. President, if there is no actual disturbance in the southern States I can see no necessity for this ninth section, which provides for the distribution of arms. I have understood from Senators on the other side since I have had a seat in this body that reconstruction was all that was desired; that it was to be the panacea for everything; that there would be peace and harmony if reconstruction could take place. Reconstruction has taken place in one mode, and yet this measure is introduced, the very object of which is to arm the negroes against the whites. There can be no other purpose and no other object.

I do not understand that Senators on this side of the Chamber are opposed to the reduction of the Army, as has been suggested by the Senator from Iowa. If the Senate will disconnect this ninth section of the bill from the other portion of it, the Senators on this side of the Chamber will be found voting for the reduction of the Army. I assume that Senators were sincere when they asked for this reduction, and consequently a diminution of the expenses of the country. But connected with that measure is a section which is disapproved by Senators who think as I do, and for which they cannot vote.

Where was the necessity of adding the ninth section to this bill? Was there any? Has it any natural connection with or affinity to it? I hold in my hand a bill passed by the House of Representatives containing the very provisions of the ninth section; a bill coming from the House single and isolate, upon which the Senate expected a vote, and if the vote had been taken upon that bill, the Senators on this side would have voted against it, and still have voted for the reduction of the Army. Why has this bill which has passed the House of Representatives providing for the distribution of arms been laid aside, and its provisions incorporated into a bill for the reduction of the Army, if it has not been to force Senators on this side of the Chamber to vote against the bill itself? I shall vote against the bill as it stands, if the ninth section remains a portion of it, but I should vote for the bill if the ninth section were taken from it. The ninth section has virtually passed the House of Representatives as a separate bill, and a vote can be taken upon it in the Senate if the majority pleases.

I do not see any inconsistency in Senators voting against this bill with the ninth section in it; nor do I see that there is anything in the conduct of the Democratic and Conservative party to bring on a war of races or any collision. There is no disposition to do it. If any hostility is brought about it will be by the act of Congress itself by these reconstruction laws. The tenure-of-office bill was believed to be unconstitutional by the party to which I am attached. The Freedman's Bureau bill was deemed to be unconstitutional by the same party; and all the reconstruction acts have been liable to the same constitutional objection. Does it follow, because we consider these acts unconstitutional, that therefore it is necessary to bring on a conflict of arms? No, sir; the conflict is to be one of opinion. The voice of the people is to decide this great controversy, not a conflict of arms. It is to be determined by the ballots, not bullets, of the American people.

The election will be passed before the electoral votes can be counted. What, then, is the object of arming the negroes, for this is virtually doing so. The Senator from West Virginia says that in Texas but a small portion of the whites were loyal to the Government, while the negroes were loyal. Then these loyal men, who are the negroes mostly, are to be armed. They are to be armed against the great majority of the whites, who constitute what are called the rebel portion of those communities.

Mr. CONNESS. With the Senator's permission I will remind him that the bill does not propose to send arms to Texas, Mississippi, or Virginia.

Mr. VICKERS. The same reason applies to the States in which it is proposed to send arms. South Carolina has a majority of negroes in it. Is not South Carolina in the bill? Is not the legislative power of that State in the hands of the negroes?

Then you propose to arm the negroes against the white population because you deem all disloyal who are opposed to your reconstruction measures. The very test of loyalty set up by Congress is an approval and support of the reconstruction laws. If that is the test, and all others are to be armed, do you not arm the negroes against the white population?

The Senator from Iowa said that the arms were to be placed in the hands of the Governors of these States. Who elected those Governors? Was it not the negro vote? Can it be questioned that those who placed the Governors in power will receive the arms from them, just as certainly as if the Senate voted that the arms should be placed in their hands? The question is now presented to the Senate, Will you arm the negroes? The Senator from Indiana says "Yes; arm the negroes; arm the loyalists for the purpose of keeping in subjection the rebels." Who are the rebels? Every one opposed to your measures of reconstruction. Every one who is opposed to that doctrine is denominated a rebel. Then you place these arms in the hands of the loyal population, consisting of a majority of negroes; and if you do so what use is to be made of them? I admired the frankness of the Senator from Missouri when he said, if necessary, to protect themselves at the ballot-box. Yes, he would do it at the ballot-box; and can there be any doubt that these arms will be used to prevent persons from voting who have the right to vote? We all know the ignorance of this portion of the people, their excitability, and we know that when they are manipulated by white agents they can be made to do almost anything.

My amendment provides that if it shall be necessary to furnish arms it shall be done by the President of the United States. Who has the authority to suppress domestic violence or repel invasion? Is it not the President of the United States? Congress does not give him the power to do so, but the Constitution itself, in the fourth section of the fourth article, provides that—"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

Is it not "domestic violence" that Senators say is apprehended in these reconstructed States? Is it not "domestic violence" that you say these arms are to be placed in the hands of the negroes to suppress? Is not this provision a circumvention of the section of the Constitution which I have read? The Constitution places this power in the hands of the Executive, and when the Executive, upon satisfactory information given to him, is informed of such a state of facts, he is bound by his oath of office and by his duty, as a former President did in the case of Rhode Island, to suppress the insurrection or domestic violence. The Executive has not been applied to, and, if I understand, domestic violence does not now exist in the South to such an extent as to require any intervention on the part of the President.

Then why are these men to be armed now if it be not for the purpose of using force? Suppose these arms shall be used to prevent persons from voting who have the legal right to vote, and the election shall be carried in those States by force and violence; those votes will be sent to Washington to be counted as the electoral votes for a certain candidate, when there may not have been a single elector properly elected. Congress has no right to examine into that matter, to investigate the question of force used in the election, and when the votes come here, they will be counted, and if counted they may elect a President, when, if the vote were a full one and the voice of the people could be fairly ascertained, the decision might elect other candidates. I know of no authority in the Congress of the United States to examine a question of that character.

The amendment that I have offered will give to the Executive the power at any time to send relief to the South if the necessities of the case require it; but I have postponed the distribution of the arms until the 1st of January, in order that the election may pass in peace and quiet, that there may be no violence and no disorder. If, however, there shall be cause for interference, the amendment provides that the President may, upon application, suppress any domestic insurrection that may arise.

Mr. CONNESS. There is one little difficulty in the way of the amendment of my friend from Maryland in having these arms distributed by the order of the President of the United States. I fear the President could not find out who was Governor of South Carolina, nor of any of the other of these reconstructed States. Judging by the tenor of the proclamations that he has issued, and the messages sent in here, relative to the ratification of the constitutional amendment by those States, he evidently does not know who are the Governors of those States. He speaks of the persons that we believe are the Governors of those States as "those who write themselves Governors;" and he would make a mistake no doubt, and send the arms to Perry, in South Carolina, for he is the only man whom he knows as Governor of South Carolina. If he admitted that Governor Scott was Governor of that State I should, perhaps, be willing to trust him that the arms would reach Governor Scott; but it is very evident now from the tenor of his proclamations that he would never send them to Governor Scott. That being the case, and my friend being a sincere gentleman, I think he must have forgotten that circumstance, else he would not attempt to place the distribution of the arms in the discretion of the President.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I am obliged to say a few words. I shall not occupy the Senate long. I disavow entirely the position assigned me by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] of being opposed to the reduction of the Army. I said nothing to warrant the imputation in the course of my former remarks.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, I had not the opportunity of hearing the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I alluded more particularly to the remarks submitted by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, whose speeches I did hear. I was necessarily absent from the Chamber while the Senator from Pennsylvania was speaking.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am strongly in favor of the reduction of the Army to a lower number even than that provided for by the amendment. The bill which we had under consideration before, fixed the number at twenty-six thousand. This amendment fixes the number at thirty thousand, being somewhat greater than it was before. I am for the lowest number. I am for the first proposition which was introduced from the committee, to wit, fixing the number of troops at twenty-six thousand. It is my opinion that with the number fixed at that figure there would be an adequate supply for any necessity which will exist in the southern country before the meeting of Congress in December next. I believe there are no more than twelve or fifteen thousand troops now in those States. They have been found adequate to preserve order during all the exciting period during which reconstruction has been going on, in which these States have been undergoing the process of reorganization.

Now, sir, the Senator from Wisconsin, in suggesting that the officers and soldiers of the United States can preserve the peace, and can insure fairness in the elections that are to take place during the coming fall in the South much better than local militia organized under those governments, took no position inconsistent with a position for the large reduction of the Army of the United States. The two things are not at all inconsistent. There would be an adequate supply of troops for southern purposes if the number were fixed as low as twenty-six thousand, which was proposed by the bill, or of thirty thousand, which is now proposed by the amendment. There would doubtless be as large a supply then available for the purpose of preserving order as are now used or have been recently used in that section of country.

The pending amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland postponing this distribution of arms until the 1st of January next must necessarily be resisted by those who are in favor of this ninth section of the amendment, because it would obviously defeat the purpose of that section. The elections in the South have been to a great extent controlled and governed by the Army of the United States. That fact is patent to the most superficial observation. Congress has laid down the rules under which elections shall be held in that section of the Union, has prescribed the terms under which the right of suffrage shall be exercised in all those States, and has, in substance, dictated leading material, vital provisions of the southern constitutions, and has retained to itself absolute power over them after they were formed, to adopt them or to reject them. In short, and to state it all in a word, the simple truth is that those southern constitutions and governments have been prescribed by Congress, have been formed under its direction, and subject to its control. They are its work. They have not proceeded from the spontaneous action of the people in those States. It is too plain for argument; it is too plain for dispute; and yet the Senator from Iowa tells us that this subject is entirely within the control of the people of those States, and that those provisions of their constitutions which require odious oaths disfranchising large masses of the inhabitants is not the work of Congress; that Congress is not responsible for them; that they are the work of the people of those States over which we have no control, and for which no just responsibility can be imposed upon us. How clearly all that is opposed to the plain truth of history, to the facts that are known to us all. Those oaths which prevent any man holding certain opinions from voting at elections, constituting a rule or test applicable to one half or more of the population of some of those States, are the work of Congress. Why? Because those constitutions were made under the authority and dictation of Congress; because they were submitted here and accepted by Congress and pronounced by it to be republican in character, although they carried disfranchisement broadcast upon their very face, and although the argument from the beginning has been that it is the duty of Congress to guaranty republican forms of government to those States, and forms which shall permit the colored men in those States to vote, because disfranchisement is anti-republican in character. If, therefore, there be any inconsistency in position I maintain that it is with the Senator from Iowa and those who think with him, and not with those who are resisting the passage of this measure.

A few words more and I shall leave this subject. All the elections in the States named in this amendment are under the control of a particular class or party in those States. They have the State organizations. They will have nearly all the election officers. They will have complete civil control over the holding of elections, and control, also, over the decision of contested questions regarding those elections. All the political power of those State governments is lodged in the hands of a party. Now, what does this bill propose? It proposes that as soon as the troops of the United States are withdrawn, and their influence over the elections withdrawn, there shall be substituted a local military power. For what purpose? To superintend the elections, under pretense of repressing disorder, to intimidate men from attending the polls, to drive men from the polls, and to secure, by the use of force, a result such as is desired where other and civil instrumentalities will not answer. That is it. Of course the adoption of this amendment, proposed by the Senator from Maryland, will defeat this object.

Mr. President, I have believed from the beginning—I have more than feared, I have believed—since we commenced the discussion of this subject of elections in the South at the present session, that they would be a huge and shameless fraud. After reading the papers in regard to the election in Arkansas I could come to no other conclusion; and Congress by its legislation and by its policy has not given encouragement merely to unfair, unjust, lawless, corrupt elections, but in the present measure proposes to provide the instrumentality by which elections shall be secured. For any avowed purpose this measure is unnecessary. For a few weeks or months you might permit, as your military departments exist, as your commanders are upon the spot, as an adequate military force is located there, and as you do not propose to dismiss it even by this measure of reduction and reform—I say you might permit the existing condition of things to continue until after the elections are held. If the object was only to preserve the peace, you could rely upon the officers and soldiers of the United States for fairness and faithful conduct much more than you can upon local militia gathered from the ranks of a political party and organized and directed by local political power. Greater impartiality and a higher sense of honor would be shown by the former than by the latter.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will pardon me I desire to ask him a question. It is whether in the State of Pennsylvania there is at this time an organized militia.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There is a mere shell of one.

Mr. HARLAN. Then the Senator will pardon me for asking the further question whether he thinks that maintaining a fair election in Pennsylvania requires that this militia should be disbanded until after the election.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, by law in Pennsylvania no military men in arms, none as an organized body, can approach within a certain distance of a place of election. If they do they may be arrested and punished by the criminal law. They are kept away from the elections; peace is preserved only by civil instrumentalities, by the peace officers, and so it must be always if you would preserve elections pure and free from improper interference; whereas for the South, instead of the guards which we have in Pennsylvania and other States of the North, you are proposing an election instrumentality by this bill of a military character. I dare say that you could secure your results in most of these States without it. As you control the civil governments, as you will control through your election officers the holding of elections, as you will control through other officers the returns and the contests that may take place over returns, I take it for granted that you would get political results without this bill; but it would seem to be the purpose of the congressional majority to make their scheme of reconstruction as odious as possible, to load it down with every circumstance which can degrade its character and render hereafter the argument of its invalidity (if we shall have a fair discussion and a fair decision upon that question) most clear and manifest to the apprehension of the whole world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. VICKERS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The question being put, the Chair announced that the call for the yeas and nays was not sustained, only three members rising to second the call.

Mr. VICKERS. I call for a division.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I simply want to make one remark. I do not remember before this session, during my five years of service here, that the yeas and nays were ever refused upon an important measure.

Mr. WILSON. This is not an important one. You can have them on the main question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is very important.

Mr. WILSON. This amendment is of no account.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division is called for on the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARLAN. I admit the propriety of the criticism of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I think any Senator has a right to record his name if he wishes.

Mr. WILSON. Well, let us have the vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 3, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, and Vickers—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cat-tell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wado, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Freling-huysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Whyte, and Yates—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a verbal modification in the fourth section, by striking out the words "carrying into effect of the provisions of this act, specifying in detail the manner in which the consolidation of regiments shall be provided for," and inserting "reduction of the officers of the Army."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the word "thereof" in line twenty-eight of the ninth section:

And provided, That the said Secretary shall be satisfied that the said arms shall be necessary to preserve peace and order in the said States.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe that changes the text we have agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. No; it is an addition.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VICKERS. I move to amend the bill by inserting at the end of the ninth section:

And that a bond with ample penalty and security shall be first executed and approved by the Secretary of War for the return of such arms and accouterments when called for by the War Department.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. VICKERS. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the roll was called.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, (when his name was called.) I have paired off with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were here he would vote against the bill, and I for it.

The call of the roll having been concluded, Mr. VAN WINKLE. I paired off with Mr. DAVIS early in the evening; but as I understand that my vote is necessary to make a quorum I vote nay.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cat-tell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Wado, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Doolittle, Van Winkle, and Vickers—4.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Freling-huysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Whyte, and Yates—30.

So the bill was passed.

MRS. GENERAL RICHARDSON.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1337. I simply wish to have it taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson, at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 3d day of November, 1862, on which day General Richardson died from wounds received in the battle of Antietam on the 17th of September, 1862, the pension to be continued during her widowhood, and if that should terminate, then to be continued to Israel Philip Richardson, sole surviving child of General Richardson, until he shall become sixteen years old. The pension heretofore allowed to Mrs. Richardson under general law is to be discontinued, but the sum received by her under the same is to be deducted from the pension hereby granted.

Mr. HARLAN. I am not willing to vote for that bill in its present form. If in the opinion of the Military Committee that pension ought to be raised I am perfectly willing to vote to raise it from the date of the passage of the bill; but if I heard it read correctly it goes back six years. It is a bad principle to establish.

Mr. CAMERON. I move to postpone this bill and take up the bill admitting free of duty the cap for a monument to be erected at Harrisburg. We cannot pass this bill to-night.

Mr. THAYER. I did not expect that we could; but I wish it to be left as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON. I have no objection to that; but I wish the resolution that I have referred to be considered. I got out of bed a little while ago to come here and make a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that the bill of the Senator from Nebraska be laid over informally, and that we take up the other matter.

Mr. THAYER. I will agree to that.

MONUMENT AT HARRISBURG.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask, then, that the resolution to which I have referred be taken up.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 343) to admit free of duty certain statuary, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the statue representing the figure of Victory, intended to surmount the monument in memory of the Pennsylvania soldiers who fell in the Mexican war, now about being erected on the capitol grounds at Harrisburg, being in marble cut in Italy, and which will soon be ready for shipment, shall be admitted free of duty.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, July 20, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. DE HAAS, of Washington.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS OF NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. DAWES presented the credentials of C. C. Bowen, member-elect from the eighth congressional district of South Carolina, and of Israel G. Lash, member-elect from the fifth district of North Carolina; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider. During this call joint resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures are in order.

VENTILATION OF HOUSE HALL.

Mr. TABER introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 346) for heating and ventilating the Hall of the House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time, and referred to a select committee of five.

Mr. TABER. The following letter will explain the object of the joint resolution:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 20, 1868.

SIR: I have had occasion during several weeks of the present summer to sit in the galleries of the House and watch its proceedings, and I take the liberty to say that the heated and impure air which the Representatives of the nation are compelled to breathe during many hours each day while in the performance of their duties is a disgrace to the country, and as it comes directly within my professional knowledge and experience to know how, instead of having the Hall filled with foul air at a temperature of ninety-five degrees, to fill it with pure air at any desired temperature, say seventy degrees, in the hottest weather, I feel that the disgrace of the present arrangement will attach somewhat to me if I do not present a proposition to effect the change.

A brief description of my plan is as follows:

I would, first, multiply by forty times the present quantity of fresh air which is thrown into the Hall in a given time. No method of ventilating can succeed without this provision for quantity.

Second, I would provide for a free egress through the glass ceiling and roof without disturbing the ornamental and appropriate appearance of the former.

Third, I would place mechanical coolers in the main flue to be used in summer, which should be upon essentially the same principle as the machines now in successful operation manufacturing ice in hot climates from warm water.

Fourth, I would enlarge the heating capacity for winter, so that the greatly increased quantity of air I propose to deliver into the Hall may still be made warm enough in extreme cold weather.

These changes, well and thoroughly executed, would render the otherwise magnificent Hall the most delightful and healthful resort members could find in hot weather.

I am prepared to enter into contract with the proper authorities and give satisfactory sureties for its faithful execution to accomplish the foregoing work.

I am, very respectfully,

ALBAN C. STIMERS.

Hon. STEPHEN TABER, M. C.,
Hall of Representatives, United States Capitol.
WILLIAM WAGNER.

Mr. CAKE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1446) for the relief of William Wagner; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JACOB S. FUHRMAN.

Mr. CAKE also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 347) to pay the claim of Captain Jacob S. Fuhrman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS—NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. JONES, of North Carolina, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 348) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to the loyal citizens of the State of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MARY RANDALL VARIAN.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1441) granting a pension to Mary Randall Varian; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

POST ROUTE IN IOWA.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1442) to establish a post route from Springfield, Iowa, to Victor, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRINTING LAND OFFICE CIRCULARS IN GERMAN.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 349) authorizing the Congressional Printer to print land office circulars in the German language for distribution in Europe; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. COBB introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 350) for the relief of certain honorably discharged soldiers of the volunteer forces of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ROGUE RIVER INDIAN WAR.

Mr. MAILLORY introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 351) extending the act of July 17, 1854, providing for the payment of the expenses of the Rogue river Indian war to two companies of Oregon volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MONTANA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. CAVANAUGH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1443) authorizing the appointment of three commissioners to examine the claims of the Territory of Montana for volunteers during the late Indian war, and to report upon the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ORDNANCE FOR SOLDIERS' MONUMENTS.

Mr. HILL introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 352) for furnishing certain ordinance for soldiers' monuments in New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories, in their inverse order, for resolutions, commencing with the State of Wisconsin, where the call rested at the expiration of the morning hour on Monday last.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS, WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 353) in regard to certain lands granted to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State by an act approved May 5, 1864; which was read a first and second time.

The question being on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. HOPKINS called for the previous question.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be certified and conveyed to the West Wisconsin Railway Company, (a corporation established by the laws of Wisconsin, and which, by the laws of that State, is entitled to the land grant made in the second section of the act mentioned in the title of this act,) from time to time, as the railway of the company progresses, out of any public lands now belonging to the United States not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, or to which a preemption claim or right of homestead settlement has not attached, and on which a bona fide settlement and improvement has not been made under color of title derived from the United States, or from the State of Wisconsin, within the limit specified and prescribed by the act to which this act is an amendment, an amount of lands per mile equal to that mentioned in the said act as intended to aid in the construction of a railroad from the town of Tomah, in the county of Monroe, Wisconsin, to the St. Croix river or lake, between townships twenty-five and thirty-one.

The second section provides that in case it shall be found that of the lands so directed to be certified and conveyed a sufficient quantity is not contained within the limit mentioned in the preceding section of this act, then the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be certified and conveyed to said company an amount sufficient to make up such deficiency from the odd numbered sections of lands belonging to the United States not reserved or otherwise disposed of, or to which a preemption claim or homestead right has not attached, and on which a bona fide settlement and improvement has not been made under color of title from the United States, or the State of Wisconsin, along the line and route of the railroad of the St. Croix and Lake Superior Railroad Company. But the lands so certified and conveyed are not to be more than twenty miles from the line of the railroad, as the same shall be fixed, established, and plat filed with land department.

The third section provides that the time fixed and limited for the completion of the railroad from Tomah, in the county of Monroe, to St. Croix river or lake, between townships twenty-five and thirty-one, in the act of May 5, 1864, shall be further extended for a period of three years. But if the railroad company shall not have completed and in operation the railroad from Tomah to Black river falls on or before one year from the passage of this act the act is to be null and void.

Mr. MAYNARD. This bill ought to go to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HOPKINS] demands the previous question.

Mr. HOPKINS. The same bill has been before the Committee on the Public Lands, and has been agreed upon in exactly this form.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question should not be seconded, will it not be in order to move the reference of this joint resolution to the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 30, noes 40.

The SPEAKER, under the rules, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. HOLMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-three, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; and on that motion demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of the sickness of his daughter.

PERSONS UNDER MILITARY SENTENCE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I submit the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House of the names of all persons now under sentence by military commissions, courts, or any other military authority at Dry Tortugas, together with the nature of the crimes charged and the term of sentence and the unexpired time now remaining. Also the same information with reference to all persons imprisoned at Atlanta, Georgia, where it is reported some twenty persons are confined in military dungeons; also the same information with reference to all persons imprisoned at Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I raise the point of order that this, being a resolution calling for executive information, it must lie over one day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The resolution cannot be considered on this day without unanimous consent.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw the resolution.

STUDIO OF MISS VINNIE REAM.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. At the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Whereas the rooms occupied as a studio by Miss Vinnie Ream are no longer wanted to accommodate Mr. Woolley: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That Miss Ream may continue to occupy the same until she has completed the statue of Mr. Lincoln, not exceeding the term of one year, and not using it for any other purpose than completing the model of said statue.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the House will unanimously consent to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for a few minutes in reference to this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The call for the previous question is pending; but the Chair will not check the gentleman from Pennsylvania unless the point of order should be raised.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Some time ago, when we had a rebel recusant witness, he occupied a room which had but two windows in it; and it was thought by our polite Sergeant-at-Arms that he had not sufficient light to read his literature through the day. Hence a resolution was passed by which we took away the room occupied by a girl who for two years had been at work upon the statue of Mr. Lincoln which we had intrusted to her, and which was about two thirds finished in clay; and we did this that Mr. Woolley might be accommodated with an ante-room. He was thus accommodated until he had purged his perjury. When he had purged himself he was then discharged. Since then the captain of police has occupied part of it once a day, and it has been an annoyance to this lady, who has been attempting to finish her work. To remove the statue as it is now it is agreed on all hands would destroy it. I hope the House will allow her to go on and finish it where it is. If I had the preparing of the lodgings for Mr. Woolley, instead of getting up a parlor with new carpets for him I would have thrust him into "the blackhole" rather than turn this lady out of her studio, and prevent her carrying out her aspirations for several years. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not object to any of the gentleman's remarks except that about the "blackhole." [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I did not intend to put the gentleman there.

Mr. MULLINS. He is the last man to object to a dark hole. It is the life of his party. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would allow him to go into any dark hole he wanted to. [Renewed laughter.]

The previous question was seconded, eighty having voted in the affirmative; yeas not counted.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. EGGLESTON demanded the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 18, yeas 88.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So (one fifth of those present not having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—yeas seventy-seven, yeas not counted.

So the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF MACHINERY AT PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the expenses incurred by the committee in taking testimony in the investigation ordered by resolution of July 6, 1868, into the purchase of machinery at the Philadelphia navy-yard be paid out of the contingent fund; and the committee have power to continue the investigation and report at the next session.

Mr. SAWYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISS VINNIE REAM—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that the resolution just passed continues Miss Vinnie Ream in the use of her studio for one year, when the jurisdiction of this House extends only until the 4th of March next—about eight months.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The same construction will be put upon this as upon the resolution to count the electoral votes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a parallel case, about the next Congress counting the electoral votes. The jurisdiction of this House as a House extends only to the expiration of the next session. The Chair has made the statement so the lady should not be surprised.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. All Miss Vinnie Ream can ask of this House is to do what it can.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. PAINE. I submit the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the bill providing for the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara, now in the Committee of the Whole, be postponed until the 10th of December next, and made the special order after the morning hour.

Mr. KELSEY. I object to the part making it a special order.

The SPEAKER. That part of the resolution requires unanimous consent.

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw the resolution.

CRETAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, This House view with deep interest the heroic struggle of the Cretans to free themselves from the yoke of Turkish despotism, and to achieve their independence as a people, that liberty which is the inalienable right of all men; and that we, in common with the whole American people, sympathize with them in their sufferings, and ardently wish them speedy triumph.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAM PLOWS FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 354) admitting steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1868.

The joint resolution extends and continues in further force the provision of section two of the joint resolution approved March 26, 1867, respecting the importation of agricultural machinery free of duty for the period of one year from the 30th of June, 1868, and provides that any such machinery shipped before that date or which may have arrived since that date shall be exempt from duty.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Is this subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would be if the previous question was not moved.

Mr. MOORHEAD. It is a part of the tariff bill now in Committee of the Whole, and I do not like to pass it piecemeal. I rise to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has moved the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to relieve the Committee of the Whole of the tariff bill and bring it into the House at this time?

The SPEAKER. It would not, even if the State of Pennsylvania or Tennessee was called, for any proposition which imposes a tax must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. The tariff bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It is unfinished business in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. The amendment I would offer would be to attach the balance of the tariff bill to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could attach exemptions in the tariff bill, but nothing which imposes a tax on the people, if objection is made.

Mr. MOORHEAD. This is a tax on the people as much as anything in the tariff bill.

The previous question was seconded.

On ordering the main question there were—yeas 62, yeas 43.

Mr. MOORHEAD demanded tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the main question was ordered; and the joint resolution was read a first and second time, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MILLER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD GRANT IN FLORIDA.

Mr. HAMILTON presented a memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of Florida, praying for a grant of alternate sections of land for six miles on both sides of the road for building a railroad from Quincy, Florida, to and through Marianna, in Jackson county, to Pensacola, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

Mr. HAMILTON also presented a resolution of the same convention, requesting Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States establishing equal and uniform suffrage in all the States of the Union; which, on motion of Mr. Brooks, was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

FLORIDA INDIANS.

Mr. HAMILTON also presented a memorial of the same convention, in relation to the Florida Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

UNITED STATES COURT IN FLORIDA.

Mr. HAMILTON also presented a resolution of the same convention, for the removal of the United States court from St. Augustine to Jacksonville, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAY OF JAMES H. BURCH, CONTESTANT.

Mr. UPSON. In behalf of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] I report from the Committee of Elections the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid to James H. Burch, of the State of Missouri, out of the contingent fund of the House, $2,500, in full for time spent and expenses incurred in prosecuting his claim to a seat in this House.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. KERR. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 76, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnoll, Baldwin, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferriss, Fields, Goss, Griswold, Hamilton, Hawkins, Heaton, Hill, Hinds, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Raum, Schenck, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Stokes, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beck, Bingham, Brooks, Cary, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Johnson, Thomas L. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, William B. Washburn, Wood, and Woodward—76.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Blackburn, Blaine, Boyer, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Calk, Chanler, Cornell, Dewesse, Dodge, Ela, Farnsworth, Finney, French, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Harding, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Newsham, Phelps, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Sypher, Thomas, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—62.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered, being upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

* The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 75, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beck, Bingham, Boles, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Calk, Cary, Cook, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Kerr, Ketchum, Knott, Koontz, Laffin, Marshall, Maynard, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Pike, Poland, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, Lawrence S. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—60.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is entitled to the floor.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections have instructed me to report back the credentials of Israel G. Lash, Representative-elect from the fifth congressional district of North Carolina, with a recommendation that he be admitted to his seat upon taking the oath prescribed by act of July 2, 1862.

The report of the Committee of Elections was then agreed to.

Mr. ISRAEL G. LASH then presented himself and took the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections have also instructed me to report back the credentials of C. C. Bowen, Representative-elect from the eighth congressional district of the State of South Carolina, with the statement that while the credentials are in due form of law, Mr. Bowen, having participated in the rebellion, is consequently unable to take the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862. But his disabilities having been removed by act of Congress the Committee of Elections recommend that he be admitted to his seat upon taking the oath prescribed by the act of Congress of July 11, 1863, prescribing the oath of office to be taken by those whose political disabilities have been removed by act of Congress.

Mr. MULLINS. I want to withdraw the objection I made to this man the other day, as I am told that I was mistaken—that this is not the man I thought he was.

The SPEAKER. His disabilities having been removed by act of Congress he is entitled to be sworn.

Mr. DAWES. That the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] may not labor under a misapprehension, I will say to him that this Mr. Bowen is precisely the man he thought he was. But by act of Congress Mr. Bowen is entitled to his seat here, notwithstanding his participation in the rebellion, as much as the gentleman and myself are entitled to our seats.

Mr. MULLINS. Allow me to say a few words. By an understanding with different individuals in this House I did not oppose the disability bill when it passed the House the last time. But they agreed with me that they would assist in sifting this case if I would not make opposition to that bill. Now, by the members from that State I am informed that not less than twelve of every hundred persons named in that bill are opposed to you and me this day. This is the gulf, the maelstrom that is to swallow you and me up before we are done with it.

Mr. DAWES. I knew the gentleman desired to make opposition to this case, and therefore I did not want him to labor under a mistake.

Mr. MULLINS. This gentleman was originally born, as I am told, in the State of Ohio.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman says Mr. Bowen was originally born in Ohio. Can he tell us where he was born the next time?

Mr. MULLINS. He was born here a few days ago in this House according to your construction and delivery, and a false birth, I believe it was, too.

Against this individual as a man I have nothing more than I have against you, Mr. Speaker. But upon the political issues as they present themselves here, so far as they relate to him as a man, I desire to be understood. He voluntarily went to the State of South Carolina some ten or fifteen years ago. When the war broke out he voluntarily accepted at the hands of the rebels the office of captain. Shortly thereafter, for valiant services, I suppose, in killing Union men, and running women and children from their houses, he was promoted to the position of major. While acting as major my information is that he killed his rebel colonel. Of that I have not to complain. He was arrested, tried, and imprisoned. While he was in prison the Federal army came along, and of course broke his fetters. Then it was a dernier resort with him to take the loyal side, or go with the rebels and to the gallows. He turned to the loyal side, and while in the Federal army, acting in some capacity, as General Sickles himself told me, he did so bad that he had to be incarcerated again. Then he turned around and became a swift advocate for the black man's pay.

Now, upon this subject of pardons, God for once astonished the world by producing a son who took upon himself your sins and mine, and died that we through faith in his crucifixion might live. We have taken to pardoning men here, which is astonishing. But when we pardon can we see the heart, and see the workings of that heart? I cannot; and for one I am fearful to-day that when I pardon this man for what he has committed against the Government I may be taking to my bosom one who will draw the dagger, and with eyes red with vengeance again seek to strike a fatal blow at this Government. If he does, the sin will be upon those who to-day initiate him into this office. For one, I will never consent to make a stepping-stone of loyalty to bring up treason and bloodthirstiness to positions of responsibility. I am not the man to reward treason in that way. I trust this man may work hand in hand with us, and prove thoroughly to be converted. I would not object if he came as a returning prodigal, seeking a servant's place. But like all the others he comes here asking to be made a ruler. To this I object.

I have said all that I desire in regard to this question. I thank the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. DAWES] for the time he has given me.

Mr. DAWES. As to the important question, whether this man was "originally born in Ohio," I am authorized to say that, whether born there or not, he was never in the State. [Laughter.] The argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] might have been in place when we had before the House the bill removing the political disabilities of Mr. Bowen; and I doubt not that if it had been delivered at that time with the same effect with which it has been delivered to-day it would doubtless have overwhelmed all the advocates of the measure, which would have gone down before the rhetoric of the eloquent gentleman. But the measure survived, and has become a law.

The constitutional amendment has provided that when by a vote of two thirds of both branches of Congress the disabilities incurred by participation in the rebellion have been removed the man thus relieved stands in all regards upon a level with the gentleman from Tennessee or myself or any other member of this House who has never had need to have such disabilities removed. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that this man participated in the rebellion; otherwise there would have been no need of a bill to remove his disabilities. Because of his participation in the rebellion that act was passed. In point of fact, if it were proper to go behind the act to show the propriety of its passage, I might say that, although Mr. Bowen participated technically in the rebellion, he is probably as free from guilt in that matter as any who participated in it at all. He was conscripted into the rebel army, compelled to go into it by force of public sentiment. He went into the army; but he participated in no action. Neither he nor the company which he commanded was in any of the engagements with the Union soldiers. The blood of no man is upon his skirts. On the first opportunity that presented itself he abandoned the rebel cause and joined the friends of the Union and the Union cause, in the support of which he has been consistent from that hour to this. By his labors in that cause he has commended himself to every Union man in the State of South Carolina. He received in his district the hearty support of all the Union men, his majority being larger than that of any other man who has come here from the southern States; and that class who, though poor and ignorant and downtrodden, have instincts as true and unobscured as any other class of men in the country, gave him to a man their support. He comes here with the certificate of the Governor of his State; and under the act of Congress to which I have referred he is on a level with us all. His admission to his seat cannot justly encounter any legal objection nor any objection founded in that broad, generous, liberal statesmanship which is demanded by the necessities of the times, and which, if pursued steadily, honestly, faithfully, without malice and without favor, will bring about a healing of the wounds of the nation and restore this Union to its health and prosperity. I hope there will be no further objection to the admission of this man to his seat.

I demand the previous question on agreeing to the report of the Committee of Elections.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, does this report embrace any other case than that of Mr. Bowen?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. C. C. BOWEN presented himself at the Speaker's desk, and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had on the 20th instant approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1234) imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes.

IMPROVEMENT OF FALLS OF ST. ANTHONY.

Mr. DONNELLY. I submit the following conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement of the Senate, and agree to the same.

L. DONNELLY,
W. MUNGEN,
Managers on the part of the House.
ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
T. A. HENDRICKS,
S. C. POMEROY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a few minutes to explain this report, so that members may vote understandingly upon it. This House passed a bill granting two hundred thousand acres of land to improve the Mississippi river between the Falls of St. Anthony and the city of St. Paul. The Senate amended the House bill by giving one hundred thousand acres additional. The amendment was as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Minnesota, the further quantity of one hundred thousand acres of public lands, subject to the same restrictions as to selection and sale as are hereinbefore named, the proceeds whereof shall be used in making such improvements in the Mississippi river at the Falls of St. Anthony as may be deemed necessary by the Legislature of said State to protect and secure the existing navigation immediately above said falls.

This action of the Senate was based upon the report of General Warren, of the United States Army, who has been in charge of the surveys and improvements of the Upper Mississippi river. The closing words of the report are as follows:

"After the flood of July, 1867, four hundred feet having been washed away in one flood, notwithstanding the attempt to prevent it. One more like freshet would probably destroy the falls, for only one thousand feet of the magnesian limestone remains, and its thickness diminishes as the recession goes on; it was eighteen feet thick at the crest in 1866, and at the present position of the crest of the falls it is about eight feet thick; hence the present pressing emergency."

General Warren further states in this report as follows:

"So that when the action of the stream has destroyed all that remains of the hard layer but a few days will be necessary to lower the bed and produce a continuous rapid far above, not merely destroying the present water-power, but a long reach of navigable channel."

That is to say, a navigable channel, running into my State and district, eighty miles in length.

The committee of conference were appointed on the part of the House, as they necessarily had to be, in opposition to the amendment; nevertheless, when they examined into the whole subject, they concluded to recommend to the House to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same. It is on that recommendation we are now called upon to vote. The fund arising from the grant would, I am informed, be but a small amount of the sum necessary to make this improvement. By the estimate of Mr. Cook, the deputy engineering officer of General Warren, it will cost $240,000, and this grant would yield but $125,000. The balance will have to be supplied by the municipalities bordering on the stream, by the State itself, or by private enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, with this eighty miles of navigation involved and at stake we could properly come before the House and ask for a money grant. We have not done so. We ask simply, and I desire the House to understand the proposition, for a grant of one hundred thousand acres of land within the limits of the State of Minnesota. In the next place we provide that this land shall be distributed in one section to each township over the whole unsettled region of that State; and I may say that one half of the area of that State is yet unsettled, many millions of acres being unsurveyed. From that public land we propose to take one hundred thousand acres. We go still further; not desiring to interrupt the settlement of the country, we provide that this land shall be sold to actual settlers at $1 25 per acre. The proceeds shall go to the company, the land shall go to the settlers. We are in favor of public improvements as well as actual settlements. We therefore provide that settlers may take this land and pay over to the State $1 25 an acre, and the State shall pay the proceeds for this improvement. This is in conformity with that very righteous and proper policy inaugurated in this House by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. DONNELLY. Certainly.

Mr. WELKER. I want to know whether this bill which proposes to give to the State of Minnesota this large land grant to improve the Mississippi river has ever had the consideration of the Committee of Commerce of this House? It strikes me that it is a subject-matter that ought to be regulated entirely by that committee, and ought not to be presented in the form in which it now comes before the House.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that this bill does not propose to give money, but land. It has, therefore, been properly referred to the Committees on the Public Lands of the House and Senate. If we had referred it to the Committee on Commerce, and they had proposed to give land, the gentleman might very properly have made an objection that it should go to the Committee on the Public Lands.

One word more. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] whom I do not now see in his seat, has expressed himself favorable to this grant. I speak now of the grant as it originally passed the House.

Mr. WELKER. The gentleman says that this matter was considered by the Committee on the Public Lands. I desire to ask him whether he has the concurrence of even a majority of the members of the Committee on the Public Lands for this additional one hundred thousand acres appropriated by the Senate amendment? And in regard to the gentleman's statement that this is not an appropriation of money, but of land, which, of course, we all know to be the fact, I would suggest that as this relates to the improvement of a river it ought not to be reported upon by the Committee of Commerce. It seems to me no gentleman ought to ask of this House an appropriation of either land or money, particularly for an improvement in his own district, without having the proposition examined by the Committee on Commerce, which has control of appropriations of money for such purposes.

Mr. MAYNARD. Did not this come originally from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. DONNELLY. It came from the Committee on the Public Lands. I want it understood that this is a bill proposing a grant of public land. It was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and met the concurrence of every member of that committee except its chairman, [Mr. JULIAN,] and he has stated, as will be found recorded in the Globe, that it was a measure to which little objection could be made, but that he voted against it upon general principles.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am informed that the gentleman from Minnesota has stated that I was in favor of the original proposition. I desire to say he has no authority for quoting me in favor of it. When the bill was passed I was out of my seat, and of course did not vote for it.

Mr. DONNELLY. I may be in error, but I understood distinctly that the gentleman was in favor of that proposition; nay, that he was in favor of going further and appropriating the money of this Government to make this improvement. I believe he so stands recorded in a letter which is on the files of this House, which was written to a newspaper in my district, and that he objected, if at all, to this bill because it was not strong enough, and did not go far enough; and that it ought to have given money and not land. Now, if we came here asking money, I grant you that the objection of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] would be good, that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Commerce; but being a land grant, to what other committee could it properly go than to the Committee on the Public Lands?

Now, one word in regard to the objection which comes from some gentlemen against granting lands for such improvements as this. I do not wonder at it as coming from gentlemen from the eastern States, where a state of affairs is found totally different from that which exists in the West. I can only say to the gentlemen that if they lived in the undeveloped West, in a community where land is almost nothing and population is everything, they would take a different view of this question. We are not proposing this measure in the interest of speculators. This grant goes to the State of Minnesota, to be disposed of by its Legislature. Neither I nor any of my associates on this floor, or on the floor of the Senate, have any interest in this matter except as citizens of that State. Nay more, we represent the wishes of our people in this matter, and the best proof of that is the indorsement we have received at the hands of the people. In my own case, while I have been clamoring here for years for land grants for railroads and other improvements in my State, I have been sustained by increased majorities. In two years my majority was very nearly doubled in my district. Our people who cast those votes are not speculators; they are not land sharks; they are honest settlers, farmers, men engaged in developing the country. If this policy was not wise and right, do you think we would press it here, or do you think we would be indorsed if we did press it here?

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman state to the House about how much of public lands remain unappropriated or not granted away in the State of Minnesota? I understand nearly all the good and most valuable public lands we have in that State have been granted away with the exception of about the amount proposed to be covered by this grant.

Mr. DONNELLY. The gentleman is in error. If he will come out there with his entire family I will guarantee one hundred and sixty acres for each member of it under the homestead law. We have made appropriations of seven million acres of land to railroads in the State of Minnesota. That looks like an enormous aggregate. It would be in the State of Rhode Island. But we have a State as large as Pennsylvania and New York combined, a State with fifty-three million acres.

Mr. WELKER. The gentleman does not answer my question. I speak of public lands. I know there is a great deal of land in Minnesota; I am perfectly aware of that.

Mr. DONNELLY. I speak of public lands also.

Mr. WELKER. I want to know how much unappropriated public land there is there?

Mr. DONNELLY. The unappropriated public lands in Minnesota amount to many millions of acres. Let me give an instance: it was proposed to obtain a land grant for a road running through one strip of country twenty miles wide, from Taylor's falls to the State line. I wrote to the Commissioner of Public Lands, and he wrote me that there were nearly a million acres on that route alone. Half of our State is not yet settled, and we came here asking for this pittance, this paltry amount of one hundred thousand acres taken out of our own State, for which we are answerable to our own people, and we are met with all these objections. It is not fair; it is not just. There should be some confidence reposed by members in one another, and if men come here and ask these things for their State it is fair to presume that the State indorses it and that it is right. I am unwilling further to delay the House, and I demand the previous question.

Mr. CARY. I move to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to say a word upon this question.

Mr. DONNELLY. I yield to my colleague on the committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot yield after demanding the previous question.

Mr. DONNELLY. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] withdraw the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. CARY. I will do so for a moment to allow the gentleman from Maine to be heard, but will renew it immediately.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope not until I make a few remarks.

Mr. PIKE. I was upon this conference committee, but was unable to concur with the majority in the result to which they came; and as the gentleman from Minnesota has given reasons why the report should be adopted, it is proper for me to say a word or two giving the reasons why I did not concur in the report. The bill originally provided for a grant to the State of Minnesota of two hundred thousand acres of land to be sold at $1 25 an acre for the purpose of improving the Mississippi river in that State. It was passed by both branches somewhat in derogation of the ordinary rule, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] has said, because all these improvements in rivers and harbors have in other instances come from the Committee on Commerce and been incorporated in the river and harbor bill.

The Senate made an amendment to the bill, granting one hundred thousand acres of land for the purpose of preventing the further wasting away of the Falls at St. Anthony. It seems that these falls have been seriously injured within the last two or three years, and there is great danger that the limestone of which they are composed will wash away and make a series of rapids for some distance down the river, and, of course, very seriously injure the water-power at St. Anthony. The question is whether the United States Government shall interpose, or whether the individuals interested in the two flourishing towns of Minneapolis and St. Anthony, and the individuals interested in the water-power and the machinery on that water-power, shall repair these damages. It is estimated that it will cost about one hundred thousand dollars to secure these falls. The river at that point—

Mr. DONNELLY. I beg to interrupt the gentleman. I have stated, upon the estimates of the deputy of General Warren, that it would cost $240,000.

Mr. PIKE. I gave the estimate which was given to me by a party interested in this water-power. The question is whether the parties there on the spot or the General Government shall contribute. It seems to me to be but a simple private enterprise; and as private interests are to be benefited by it they should contribute to it, and not the General Government. The Mississippi river at that point is not larger than several rivers in my State, where individuals have built dams across rivers, and thereby created water-power for their own use. In this case it needs but to steady the natural water-power and to preserve the rock in its natural position, and the question before the House is whether Congress shall make a grant of land for this purpose, or whether the individuals there shall make this improvement for themselves. I have, with some reluctance, concluded to disagree with the report of the committee of conference, because several persons living in those towns were formerly constituents and good friends of mine. But it seems to me that this is a case where the General Government should not be called upon.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Are there any precedents on file where the Government undertook to improve private property?

Mr. PIKE. I know of no such precedents.

Mr. CARY. I renew the motion to lay on the table the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] yield to me to make a brief reply to the statements of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE?]

Mr. CARY. I prefer not to yield. I think we have had discussion enough on this subject.

Mr. DONNELLY. I desire but a moment or two to correct some misstatements.

Mr. CARY. Very well; I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. DONNELLY. The first point I would make in reply to the gentleman is this: that this is not an appropriation to improve the navigation of a river, but it is an appropriation to preserve an existing navigation. It is, therefore, a different case from almost any that has come before this Congress.

In the next place, as to the question of private interest, it is true that private interests may be benefited by the passage of this bill.

But I would ask this House to reflect that you can pass scarcely any public measure that does not benefit private interests. If you pass a land-grant railroad bill you benefit the private property all along the line of that road. If you make an appropriation to improve a harbor you benefit the shipowners doing business in those harbors as well as the towns upon its shores.

A question has been asked as to precedents. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that on page 573 of the acts of 1865 and 1867 will be found an absolute grant of land to Kansas to build a bridge over the Republican river. And I hold in my hand a list of grants of lands to canals, wagon-roads, and of all manner of measures of that sort.

I say again, in conclusion, that my State asks for this grant; the united delegation from my State asks for it. And I do say that the members of this House, in a matter of doubt, ought to follow the disposition and desires of those who represent the community, and who are answerable to that community.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would be glad if the gentleman would inform the House whether this is of sufficient public importance to justify this grant upon the ground that it would preserve the navigation of the Mississippi river, irrespective of the interests of private mill-owners?

Mr. DONNELLY. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. It is of the utmost importance to the people of that section of the State. If the mill-owners were too poor or too illiberal to save the falls, and if that natural dam were to be swept away, the entire community would suffer. The railroads concentrating there would find their business extinguished, and the people of those cities would have to disperse. I now call the previous question.

Mr. CARY. I renew the motion that the report be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 72, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arnell, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Cary, Coburn, Delano, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Koontz, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Marshall, Maynard, McCullough, Mercer, Moore, Mullins, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Phelps, Pile, Polsey, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Taylor, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Axtell, Bailey, Banks, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Boyden, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, French, Goss, Gravely, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Ladin, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pile, Plants, Pomeroy, Sawyer, Schenck, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—72.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barnum, Beaman, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Deweese, Dockery, Dodge, Ela, Ferry, Finney, Garfield, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Julian, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Orth, Peters, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Raun, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Sypher, Taber, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—65.

So the report of the committee of conference was laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to withdraw that motion. The original bill as passed by the House is conceded by all to have been a just measure, and—

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider is not debatable.

Mr. DONNELLY. I demand the yeas and nays. It is not fair to slaughter the whole bill in this way.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have, I believe, voted against this bill persistently throughout; but I hope that now, by general consent all round, the bill will be allowed to become a law in the shape in which it was originally passed by the House.

Mr. DONNELLY. I shall be perfectly satisfied if that shall be done.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PILE. I rise to a parliamentary question. If this motion to lay on the table should not prevail, would it not then be in order to reconsider the vote by which the report was laid on the table to non-concur in that report and ask another conference?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to reconsider should not be laid on the table, the next question will be on reconsidering the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was laid on the table.

Mr. DONNELLY. I desire to say that I am perfectly willing the amendment shall be receded from and the bill passed in its original form, as the vote of the House on two occasions has demonstrated that it will not accept the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. A parliamentary question is in the nature of debate, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] persists in his objection to debate.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was laid on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 78, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Beatty, Benjamin, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Cary, Delano, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Lash, William Lawrence, McCullough, Mercer, Moore, Mullins, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Phelps, Polsey, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Boyden, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fields, French, Goss, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Pomeroy, Raun, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Vidal, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Windom—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Axtell, Barnum, Beaman, Beck, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Broomall, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chanler, Churchill, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Deweese, Dockery, Dodge, Eckley, Ela, Ferry, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, Kintz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Mallory, Mann, Marshall, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Orth, Peters, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Sypher, John Trimble, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—72.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider the motion to reconsider as having been agreed to if there is no objection.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The question again recurs on the motion to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I will say, if the motion to lay upon the table does not prevail, I will ask the House to non-concur in the report and another committee of conference be appointed with a view to have the Senate amendment receded from by the Senate.

The motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to.

The question next occurred on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. ROSS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has called for the previous question; but the Chair will state that it is not usual to refer a conference report to a committee.

Mr. ROSS. Is it not in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order while the previous question is pending. If the previous question be not seconded the Chair will hold the motion is in order, although he does not recollect any such case.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 56, nays 49.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The conference report was again read.

Mr. ROSS. Read the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. It will be read, although the gentleman has not the right to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as an additional section: Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Minnesota the further quantity of one hundred thousand acres of public lands, subject to the same restrictions as to selection and sale as are hereinbefore named, the proceeds whereof shall be used in making such improvements in the Mississippi river at the Falls of St. Anthony as may be deemed necessary by the Legislature of said State to protect and secure the existing navigation immediately above said falls.

Mr. WELKER. If the report of the committee of conference be rejected does not the whole matter go to another conference committee?

Mr. DONNELLY. I intend to move such a committee of conference.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is the agreement.

Mr. WELKER. I do not know anything about any agreement.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House, and a motion to lay it upon the table is in order.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the Senate amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope my friend from Illinois will withdraw his motion. I have stood up with him on this question.

Mr. ROSS. If the Senate amendment be rejected it will still leave a grant of two hundred thousand acres.

Mr. DONNELLY. It is my understanding if another conference committee is appointed, so far as my vote can control it, to have the Senate amendment receded from and the bill passed as it stood originally.

Mr. ROSS. Will not that still grant two hundred thousand acres?

Mr. DONNELLY. It will; and I understand there is little objection to it.

Mr. ROSS. There is objection on this side. I insist on my motion to lay it upon the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 81, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Cary, Eggleston, Ferriss, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Lash, William Lawrence, Marshall, McCullough, Mercer, Moore, Mullins, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Phelps, Polsey, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Stone, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Vidal, Ward, Welker, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Banks, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boyden, Rodrick R. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Earnsworth, Fields, French, Goss, Griswold, Leaton, Higby, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Raun, Sawyer, Smith, Starkweather, Stokes, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boutwell, Bowen, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Chautler, Coburn, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Delano, Dewesse, Dockery, Dodge, Eekley, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Harding, Asabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Orth, Peters, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Root, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taber, John Trimble, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—72.

So the House refused to lay the Senate amendment on the table.

Mr. DONNELLY moved that the House still further insist on its disagreement to the amendment, and ask for another committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the last vote; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. DONNELLY, Mr. MAYNARD, and Mr. ROSS, managers of said conference on the part of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. 1010) relative to pensions, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the joint resolution (S. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized, with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded in conformity with the Constitution to reconsider the same, and had resolved that the said bill do pass, two thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have given to the joint resolution entitled "A resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of the States lately in rebellion, which shall not have been reorganized," as careful examination as I have been able to bestow upon the subject during the few days that have intervened since the measure was submitted for my approval.

Feeling constrained to withhold my assent, I herewith return the resolution to the Senate, in which House it originated, with a brief statement of the reasons which have induced my action.

This joint resolution is based upon the assumption that some of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion are not now entitled to representation in Congress and to participate in the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Having heretofore had occasion to give in detail my reasons for dissenting from this view, it is not necessary at this time to repeat them. It is sufficient to state that I continue strong in my conviction that the acts of secession, by which a number of the States sought to dissolve their connection with the other States and subvert the Union, being unauthorized by the Constitution, and in direct violation thereof, were from the beginning absolutely null and void. It follows necessarily that when the rebellion terminated the several States which had attempted to secede continued to be States in the Union, and all that was required to enable them to resume their relations to the Union was that they should adopt the measures necessary to their practical restoration as States. Such measures were adopted, and the legitimate result was that those States, having conformed to all the requirements of the Constitution, resumed their former relations, and became entitled to the exercise of all the rights guaranteed to them by its provisions.

The joint resolution under consideration, however, seems to assume that by the insurrectionary acts of their respective inhabitants, those States forfeited their rights as such, and can never again exercise them except upon readmission into the Union on the terms prescribed by Congress. If this position be correct, it follows that they were taken out of the Union by virtue of their acts of secession, and hence that the war waged upon them was illegal and unconstitutional. We would thus be placed in this inconsistent attitude, that while the war was commenced and carried on upon the distinct ground that the southern States, being component parts of the Union, were in rebellion against the lawful authority of the United States, upon its termination we resort to a policy of reconstruction which assumes that it was not in fact a rebellion, but that the war was waged for the conquest of territories assumed to be outside of the constitutional Union.

The mode and manner of receiving and counting the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States are in plain and simple terms prescribed by the Constitution. That instrument imperatively requires that the President of the Senate "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Congress has, therefore, no power, under the Constitution, to receive the electoral votes or reject them. The whole power is exhausted when, in the presence of the two Houses, the votes are counted and the result declared. In this respect the power and duty of the President of the Senate are, under the Constitution, purely ministerial. When, therefore, the joint resolution declares that no electoral votes shall be received or counted from States that since the 4th of March, 1867, have not "adopted a constitution or State government under which a State government shall have been organized," a power is assumed which is nowhere delegated to Congress, unless upon the assumption that the State governments organized prior to the 4th of March, 1867, were illegal and void.

The joint resolution, by implication at least, concedes that these States were States by virtue of their organization, prior to the 4th of March, 1867, but denies to them the right to vote in the election of President and Vice President of the United States. It follows either that this assumption of power is wholly unauthorized by the Constitution, or that the States so excluded from voting were out of the Union by reason of the rebellion, and have never been legitimately restored. Being fully satisfied that they were never out of the Union, and that their relations thereto have been legally and constitutionally restored, I am forced to the conclusion that the joint resolution which deprives them of the right to have their vote for President and Vice President received and counted is in conflict with the Constitution, and that Congress has no more power to reject their votes than those of the States which have been uniformly loyal to the Federal Union.

It is worthy of remark that if the States whose inhabitants were recently in rebellion were legally and constitutionally organized and restored to their rights prior to the 4th of March, 1867, as I am satisfied they were the only legitimate authority under which the election for President and Vice President can be held therein, must be derived from the governments instituted before that period.

It clearly follows that all the State governments organized in those States under acts of Congress for that purpose, and under military control, are illegitimate and of no validity whatever; and, in that view, the votes cast in those States for President and Vice President, in pursuance of acts passed since the 4th of March, 1867, and in obedience to the so-called reconstruction acts of Congress, cannot be legally received and counted; while the only votes in those States that can be legally cast and counted will be those cast in pursuance of the laws in force in the several States prior to the legislation by Congress upon the subject of reconstruction.

I cannot refrain from directing your special attention to the declaration contained in the joint resolution, that "none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College," &c.

If it is meant by this declaration that no State is to be allowed to vote for President and Vice President, all of whose inhabitants were engaged in the late rebellion, it is apparent that no one of the States will be excluded from voting, since it is well known that in every southern State there were many inhabitants who not only did not participate in the rebellion, but who actually took part in its suppression, or refrained from giving it any aid or countenance. I therefore conclude that the true meaning of the joint resolution is that no State, a portion of whose inhabitants were engaged in the rebellion, shall be permitted to participate in the presidential election, except upon the terms and conditions therein prescribed.

Assuming this to be the true construction of the resolution, the inquiry becomes pertinent, may those northern States—a portion of whose inhabitants were actually in the rebellion—be prevented at the discretion of Congress from having their electoral votes counted? It is well known that a portion of the inhabitants of New York and a portion of the inhabitants of Virginia were alike engaged in the rebellion, yet it is equally well known that Virginia, as well as New York, was at all times during the war recognized by the Federal Government as a State in the Union, so clearly that upon the termination of hostilities it was not even deemed necessary for her restoration that a provisional governor should be appointed. Yet, according to this joint resolution, the people of Virginia, unless they comply with terms it prescribes, are denied the right of voting for President, while the people of New York, a portion of the inhabitants of which State were also in rebellion, are permitted to have their electoral votes counted, without undergoing the process of reconstruction prescribed for Virginia. New York is no more a State than Virginia; the one is as much entitled to be represented in the Electoral College as the other. If Congress has the power to deprive Virginia of this right it can exercise the same authority with respect to New York or any other of the States. Thus the result of the presidential election may be controlled and determined by Congress, and the people be deprived of their right under the Constitution to choose a President and Vice President of the United States.

If Congress were to provide by law that the votes of none of the States should be received and counted if cast for a candidate who differed in political sentiment with a majority of the two Houses, such legislation would at once be condemned by the country as an unconstitutional and revolutionary usurpation of power. It would, however, be exceedingly difficult to find in the Constitution any more authority for the passage of the joint resolution under consideration than for an enactment looking directly to the rejection of all votes not in accordance with the political preferences of a majority of Congress. No power exists in the Constitution authorizing the joint resolution or the supposed law, the only difference being that one would be more palpably unconstitutional and revolutionary than the other. Both would rest upon the radical error that Congress has the power to prescribe terms and conditions to the right of the people of the States to cast their votes for President and Vice President.

For the reasons thus indicated, I am constrained to return the joint resolution to the Senate for such further action thereon as Congress may deem necessary.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1868.

The SPEAKER. The question under the Constitution is, Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to the passage of this joint resolution?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman that perhaps it would be edifying to the gentlemen on the other side if he would explain the reference in the message to the rebellion in New York.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose that part of the message is entirely understood, so that it is unnecessary for me to explain it.

Mr. WOOD. We did not hear the gentleman's remark on this side.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will permit me I will tell him what it means. It refers to Wendell Phillips, Theodore Tilton, Henry Ward Beecher, and others of that sort.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman is mistaken. I have no doubt the message refers to those persons in New York city who, in July, 1863, went into a little rebellion.

Mr. BROOKS. He refers to those who have been in rebellion for ten or twenty years.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. To those who bade the "erring sisters go in peace."

Mr. KERR. To Mr. Greeley, of the New York Tribune.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 36, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Bently, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Bromwell, Broomhall, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Coyode, Callum, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eila, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Griswold, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketchum, Koontz, Laffin, Lush, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Poisley, Pomeroy, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Sypher, Taffie, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upton, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilton, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—134.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beck, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Cary, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aiken, Wood, and Woodward—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baker, Barnum, Beaman, Blaine, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chandler, Cornell, Dewese, Dockery, Dodge, Finney, Gravely, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, and Cadwalader C. Washburn—40.

The SPEAKER. On the question, "Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to the passage of the joint resolution?" the yeas are 134, and the nays 36. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, and it having been certified from the Senate of the United States that upon a similar vote upon reconsideration two thirds of that body have agreed to the passage of the joint resolution, I do, by the authority of the Constitution of the United States, declare that the joint resolution excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized has become a law notwithstanding the objections of the President.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POMEROY. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for the purpose of moving to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill for the purpose of non-concurring in them and asking a committee of conference.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to move a suspension of the rules?

Mr. POMEROY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, that the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1841) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table, that the amendments be non-concurred in, and a conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois, Mr. KELSEY, and Mr. WOODWARD managers of the conference on the part of the House.

AMENDMENT OF POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me to have another bill taken up for the same purpose?

Mr. POMEROY. Is it an appropriation bill?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is the bill amending the postal laws.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The bill that makes a new office?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is what we want to non-concur in.

Mr. POMEROY. I cannot yield for that purpose.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON VENTILATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following select committee ordered this morning:

Select Committee on Ventilation of the House—STEPHEN TABER, of New York; GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts; JOHN COVODE, of Pennsylvania; COLUMBUS DELANO, of Ohio; and NATHANIEL BOYDEN, of North Carolina.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. BENJAMIN on account of the sickness of his wife.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. POMEROY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.
That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: strike out the word "and," in line three of said amendment, and insert after the word "second," in the same line, the words "and third;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: after the word "upon," in said amendment, strike out all to the end of the amendment, and insert in lieu the following words: "the examiner-in-chief in said office oldest in length of commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

THEODORE M. POMEROY,
WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
Managers on the part of the House.
ROSCOE CONKLING,
WILLIAM M. STEWART,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. As this is the report of the second committee of conference on this bill, I beg the attention of the House for a very few moments to state precisely the points of difference between the different committees of conference. By the law of 1836 establishing the Patent Office as a bureau of the State Department it was provided that the principal officer of the Patent Bureau should be the Commissioner of Patents, and he was the only officer provided for by that law who was to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. All the other subordinate officers of the Patent Office were appointed solely by the Commissioner of Patents, there being none of them subject to the confirmation of the Senate. After that time the inventive genius of the American people had increased the business of the Patent Office to such an extent that in 1861 the laws relating thereto were revised. The office of Commissioner of Patents was continued. But I ask the special attention of the House to the ninth section of the law of 1861, by which it is provided that:

"For the purpose of securing greater uniformity of action in the grant and refusal of letters-patent there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three examiners-in-chief, at an annual salary of $3,000 each, to be composed of persons of competent legal knowledge and scientific ability, whose duty it shall be, on the written petition of the applicant for that purpose being filed, to revise and determine upon the validity of decisions made by examiners when adverse to the grant of letters-patent, &c."

Therefore, since 1861, instead of having a Patent Office with a Commissioner of Patents at the head, with all the other officers mere clerks, appointed by the Commissioner, we have had a bureau in form, but in fact an independent department with the Commissioner of Patents at the head, and next to him three examiners-in-chief, who are by law required to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and who are to be persons of competent legal knowledge and scientific ability. Yet by inadvertence in that act of 1861, the provision of the law of 1836 in reference to the chief clerk was left in force; so that now, as before, all the functions of the office of Commissioner of Patents, in case of a vacancy, are devolved upon the chief clerk, and it has so happened that for the last eight months all of the powers of the head of that bureau have devolved upon and been exercised by the chief clerk of the Patent Office, a man, however well qualified he may be, certainly not selected for his legal knowledge and scientific ability to discharge the duties of Commissioner of Patents, but on the contrary selected simply to discharge the ordinary duties of the chief clerk of that office.

And I may say here that that chief clerk now discharging the duties of Commissioner of Patents, is every month throughout the year determining and adjudicating upon right of property greater in amount than are adjudicated upon by any court of the United States not excepting even the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the object of this bill to be to get some person of legal attainments to adjudicate upon these questions. Has not the man now holding the position of chief clerk been a practitioner at the bar for many years, and is he not a lawyer of good reputation?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman also inform the House whether the present examiners are lawyers?

Mr. POMEROY. I will endeavor to state my side of the case as fully as circumstance will permit.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. POMEROY. I cannot answer all the gentleman's questions, for there are several questions involved in one. In answer to his first question I will say that the object of this bill is not only to get a man of legal knowledge and competent scientific ability, but something more. Under this bill, which has passed both Houses, and about which there is no disagreement except in regard to the Patent Office, whenever a vacancy occurs in any executive Department or bureau of the Government the functions of the office are to devolve upon the next officer in rank in the Department or bureau until the office is filled. These are the provisions of the bill upon which both branches of the national Legislature have now agreed. The only exception—and that is the cause of the disagreement between the two Houses—is in regard to the Commissioner of Patents; and unless some provision of law is made, either such as that recommended by the committee of conference or some other provision, the Patent Office will stand an exception to all the other Departments and all the other bureaus of the Government.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POMEROY. I cannot yield now. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] I will say that if the report of the committee of conference shall be adopted the object of it is to make the Patent Office conform—that is the leading idea of the conferees in this case—to the other Departments and bureaus of the Government, and in case of a vacancy to devolve the duties of the office upon the officer next in rank in the Department or bureau, avoiding the incourtesy of the case, the dropping down below the three officers next in rank to the Commissioner, and devolving the duties upon a clerk who has never been appointed with reference to the duties of that office, and whose qualifications for the position have never been subjected to the scrutiny of the Senate.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that at this stage of the discussion I do not propose to raise the question whether the person now performing the duties of the Commissioner is superior or inferior in point of qualifications to him upon whom those duties will be devolved if the report of the committee of conference should be adopted. I do not propose to discuss that question, because I do not think it ought to arise in the present case. The same rule which has been applied to the other Departments should be applied to this; and upon the next ranking officer should devolve the duties. When the report of the committee of conference was presented the other day and rejected by the House, there was a misapprehension on the part of many members as to the object and effect of the recommendation of the committee. I now state from information which I know to be correct, as well as though the fact rested on my own personal knowledge, that the amendment presented by the former committee of conference had no relation whatever to the appointment of any particular one of the three examiners-in-chief; it was proposed upon the assumption that the President would select from those three the one most competent to discharge the duties of the office.

Inasmuch as the partial misapprehension of the House at that time grew out of the fact that Mr. Foote is one of the examiners, and as his name was drawn into the debate the other day I deem it but an act of justice toward a man who years ago lived in my own district and whom personally I know well, to say that if the report had been adopted, and Mr. Foote had been appointed, we should have had in the position a man of perfect integrity of character, a man of fine legal abilities, and a man most thoroughly skilled in the duties pertaining to the Patent Office.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman has any information that the nomination of Mr. Foote as Commissioner of Patents has been to-day sent to the Senate?

Mr. POMEROY. I have not heard anything about that; but I can say, though I know his political views to be opposed to mine, that if he has been nominated to that office, and if he shall be confirmed, the rights of patentees and of the public as well as the interests of the Department will be maintained with justice and integrity. I have deemed it proper to say this much from my personal knowledge of this man, founded on a long acquaintance with him.

On that point I will only add that the appointment under the report of the former committee of conference would, in any event, have secured the designation of a man whose character would have been a guarantee for the proper administration of the Patent Office. But that report was rejected. In the present report we make the provision in regard to the Patent Office entirely symmetrical and consistent with the provision in regard to the other Departments and bureaus. We propose that the senior examiner-in-chief shall execute and fulfill the duties of the Commissioner in case of a vacancy until a Commissioner shall be appointed. The effect of this will be, if the report be adopted, that the duties of the Commissioner, until a successor to Mr. Theaker shall be appointed, will devolve upon Mr. Hodges.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, purely for the sake of information, and without any feeling with reference to either of the gentlemen upon whom this appointment may devolve. Is not the chief clerk in any of the Departments the senior officer, next to the officer in charge of that Department?

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir; in all the Departments we have the Secretary, then the Assistant Secretary, and then comes the chief clerk.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose the Secretary and Assistant Secretary are both out of office, who is then the ranking officer?

Mr. POMEROY. If the gentleman refers to the Patent Office, I will say that in the absence of the Commissioner the senior examiner-in-chief is the ranking officer.

Mr. LOGAN. Is that by law?

Mr. POMEROY. It is not by law, because by reason of a defect in the act of 1861 authorizing the appointment of these examiners-in-chief the provision of the act of 1836 was left in force.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly; the chief clerk was left as the senior officer next to the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. POMEROY. So I say, owing to an omission in the act of 1861.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, and I do not wish to make any debate about this, I will ask him this question. He speaks of the Patent Office as a department. Now, does he not know that it is a mere bureau? I ask him whether in all the bureaus and all the Departments, the chief clerk is not held to be the senior officer next to the head of that bureau?

Mr. POMEROY. I do not concede that is so, but in no other Department are there three examiners-in-chief like in the Patent Office. In the other Departments there are Secretaries and Assistant Secretaries, and when there is a vacancy in the first their places are filled temporarily by the latter.

Mr. LOGAN. For the purpose of getting the issue before the House I ask the gentleman from New York whether it is not the fact, under and by virtue of the law, every chief clerk in every bureau is the senior officer next to the chief of the bureau?

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the law as I understand it.

Mr. POMEROY. In the Internal Revenue Office the Commissioner has a deputy, who takes his place in case there is a vacancy. This deputy succeeds the Commissioner, by the provision of the law, if there be a vacancy, and not the chief clerk. We wish to establish the same uniformity in the Patent Office that exists in the other Departments, and by law to correct the error of the acts of 1836 and 1861. We wish to make the law of 1861 what it ought to have been made when that law was passed.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. POMEROY. I have not got through with what I have to say.

Mr. LOGAN. Only for a question.

Mr. POMEROY. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LOGAN. In the Indian Bureau, a bureau like the Patent Office, in the Interior Department, I ask the gentleman from New York whether the chief clerk is not the next in rank to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs himself? I also ask him whether in the Pension Office, also in the Interior Department, the chief clerk is not next in rank to the head of the bureau? There are three examiners-in-chief in the Patent Office. The chief clerk, under the law, is now the acting Commissioner of the Patent Office. Why, then, adopt this and now make the Patent Office an exception to all the other departments? If it is the desire to legislate the chief clerk of this department out of existence, and put some one in his place, why is it? There must be some reason for it.

Mr. POMEROY. I must resume the floor. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois this: I propose to leave to the judgment and good sense of each member of this House whether the chief clerk of the Patent Office shall rank next to the Commissioner, and in case of a vacancy become acting Commissioner, when there are in that department, under the law, three examiners-in-chief, with a salary of $4,000 each, who are appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. I wish to know whether those officers are to be held as subordinate to the chief clerk of the department, who is appointed and may be removed solely at the will of the Commissioner of Patents?

Mr. BROMWELL rose.

Mr. POMEROY. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish to suggest whether the business in which these examiners are engaged, and that in which the chief clerk is engaged, do not show which is the senior in rank? Are not these examiners employed for the mere purpose of examining into the propriety of granting patents, while the chief clerk has the general superintendence, the next man after the Commissioner? It seems to me that he is the man who, after the Commissioner, should take charge of the Patent Office.

Mr. POMEROY. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois I will repeat that what we seek to do in this report is to conform the practice in the Patent Office to that which exists in the other Departments and bureaus. As I said before, the Commissioner of Patents adjudicates more millions of property every year than any court of the United States, and for a month past the duties of that office have been performed by the chief clerk. We propose that one of the examiners-in-chief, who are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate like the highest officers of the Government, shall perform the duties of the office in case of a vacancy. It is perfectly idle to talk to me of the rank of the chief clerk. These examiners, by their education and experience, are eminently fitted for this position.

Mr. McKEE rose.

Mr. POMEROY. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. As I have said, each one of these examiners-in-chief of the Patent Office is required to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. And yet we are asked in case of a vacancy in the office of Commissioner of Patents whether a clerk appointed at will is not next in rank in the office? Well, if it be so, it is by a faulty law that should be remedied, and that right speedily. Now, I say the effect of this report of the committee of conference, if adopted, will be to devolve, until a Commissioner of Patents shall be appointed according to law, the duties of the office upon the senior examiner-in-chief, who is Mr. Hodges.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a matter of business?

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

SESSION FOR TO-NIGHT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the House to agree to a session to-night for the consideration of business on the Speaker's table. There is a vast amount of it accumulated there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. WARD objected.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move to suspend the rules.

On suspending the rules there were—ayes 79, noes 40.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, making two thirds in favor of the motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays. I do not want to go to the Speaker's table at night.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 73, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Axtell, Beatty, Benjamin, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Boyden, Roderick R. Butler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Elliot, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Griswold, Grover, Heaton, Higby, Hinds, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Ketcham, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Pile, Poland, Polsey, Pomeroy, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Smith, Stewart, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Vidal, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Beck, Benton, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buck and, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Eggleston, Elm, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Haight, Hamilton, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, McKee, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Pike, Randall, Ross, Sawyer, Seefeld, Shank, Sitgreaves, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Alken, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, and Woodward—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Broomall, Burr, Chanler, Cornell, Delano, Dewesse, Dockery, Dodge, Farnsworth, Finney, Gravely, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Judd, Kitchen, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Paine, Phelps, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Root, Solye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thomas, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—61.

So the rules were not suspended.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE OFFICES.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. Speaker, I had completed nearly all I had to say. I merely wish to state that the effect of the adoption of this conference report will be to confer the duties of the office of Commissioner of Patents upon Mr. Hodges. I understand he was for a long time Commissioner of Patents, being appointed by President Fillmore. He was appointed examiner-in-chief by Mr. Lincoln and confirmed by the Senate in 1861. From that time to this he has discharged the duties of that office. He was appointed with reference to the very qualifications needed to discharge the duties of the office of Commissioner of Patents. I neither know him personally nor Mr. Stout, and my action upon this report has not been based upon the personal character of these men, but upon the ground that a man occupying the position occupied by Mr. Hodges should in case of a vacancy in the office of Commissioner of Patents assume the duties of that office rather than a temporary clerk, a mere officer at will. I will now yield to my colleague on the committee of conference [Mr. ELDRIDGE] ten minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I have sought the floor not because of any personal interest I have in the questions involved here, but for the purpose of giving the reasons why I cannot concur with the conference committee in their report.

In the first place, as I understand this amendment, it is precisely the opposite of what the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] seems to think it is. Instead of making the practice uniform with regard to the Departments, in my judgment it creates an exception against the Commissioner of Patents. The very reading of the bill itself shows that I am right in this particular, and I ask gentlemen to listen to it:

That in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the chief of any bureau or of any office thereof, except Commissioner of Patents, whose appointment is not in the head of any executive Department, the deputy of such chief or of such officer, or if there be no deputy, then the chief clerk of such bureau shall, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, as is hereinafter provided, perform the duties of such office until a successor be appointed, or such absence or sickness shall cease.

Now, the language of the amendment itself makes an exception against the Commissioner of Patents. It provides that in this case the chief clerk shall not exercise the duties of the office in the absence or in case of the sickness or resignation of the Commissioner. In all other Departments where there is no deputy or chief assistant, in all those cases the chief clerk of that Department exercises the duties of the chief of the office; but in the case of the Commissioner of the Patent Office it is proposed to make an exception.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] tells us that the object and purpose is to provide a competent person to perform these duties, and that the chief clerk having been appointed with reference to clerical duties is not, therefore, a competent person to perform these duties. I believe that this provision of law has existed for some twenty years. Can it be possible that in the appointment of a chief clerk, the officer appointing him does not take into consideration the fact that he may have devolved upon him the duties which the chief clerk is now performing and which he must perform? Is it possible that appointments to office are made under such circumstances that the qualifications of the appointee are not considered? Does not the appointing officer select him with reference to the duties which may in any contingency be devolved upon the officer? It seems to me that that is and must be the necessary rule.

Mr. WELKER. I would ask the gentleman whether this examiner of patents, if acting as Commissioner, would not have to decide appeals from his own decisions?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is my next objection. I was about to remark that in case we devolve these duties on one of the examiners of patents the very argument of the gentleman from New York applies most forcibly against the propriety thereof. Let us see for a moment. These three chief examiners may have to hear appeals from all the examiners in the Patent Office, and to consider and review the decisions of those examiners. To whom can an appeal be taken from their decisions? To the Commissioner of Patents? And in case of his absence to whom? Why, if this bill passes, from the chief examiner to himself. Having these important questions to decide, involving, as the gentleman from New York says, larger amounts than are decided by any officer or court in the country, the chief examiner is to have devolved upon him the review of his own decisions, and the final determination of questions which he has himself determined. It is simply an appeal from Philip sober, it may be, to Philip drunk, or it may be exactly the opposite. But it is clear that the examiner is not the proper officer for the discharge of these duties.

Now, I come to consider the individual who occupies this position of chief clerk. I am certainly disinterested in this question so far as politics are concerned. I suppose all these men, the chief clerk and the three examiners—in-chief, belong to the Radical party. This chief clerk is a lawyer of twenty years' standing. The only reason I have heard urged against his fitness for this position is that his salary is less than the salary of an examiner-in-chief. If that be the only objection, then why not raise his salary so as to make his position sufficiently dignified and important to make him in that respect the equal of these chief examiners, as he is already in every other respect of learning and ability to decide the questions that may come before him?

There are important reasons in favor of the gentleman who now occupies the position of chief clerk. He has been a soldier in the Army of the United States, and has been wounded in the service of his country. He has given one son to the service of his country. He served through the entire war, and was a brave, upright, and pure man, so far as any charge has been made against him. He left his profession, and when he left the service at the close of the war, broken down in health, he took the position of chief clerk in the Patent Office. And now, because, forsooth, he gets a little more salary in consequence of filling the position of acting Commissioner of Patents during the vacancy now existing, it is proposed to take this position away from a brave soldier of the United States and give it to another, a gentleman against whom I have nothing to say, one every way worthy, I suppose, but still no more worthy, capable, and entitled to the position than the gentleman occupying the position at the present time. This gentleman, the chief clerk of the Patent Office, was wounded in the battles of Fort Donaldson, Shiloh, and Chickamauga. He was complimented, as gentlemen will see by reference to the report of General Crittenden, for his bravery and decision of action, and for the manner in which he turned defeat into victory. And his record does not stop there; it continues all through the war, and he bears the marks of his service all over his person.

Now, whether this chief clerk is a Republican or not—and I understand he is—and whether the chief examiners are Republicans or not, I say to gentlemen, if you are sincere in your professions of love for the soldier, here is one without a mark or a stain on his character, and well worthy of your support. Yet you propose to take from him the difference between $1,700 and $3,000, and give it to one who you say has been for twenty years in the Patent Office. No one finds any fault with this man; no one speaks against his character and qualifications. It is simply because of the fact that he was appointed chief clerk that you suppose he is not competent to fill this position. Now that is no reason at all. As I remarked in the beginning of my remarks, he was appointed chief clerk with reference to the duties he might be called upon to perform under the law then and now in force. He has been a counselor and practitioner at law for twenty years. He has been active in his profession. At one time he was attorney for the city of Louisville, having all the interests of that city in his charge. That fact shows the justice and propriety of his appointment. It shows the judgment and discretion of the appointing power in selecting such a man, under such circumstances, to fill the office.

These are the reasons why I could not and did not sign the report of the committee of conference. I think this gentleman is eminently fit and qualified for the position. If there is any merit in military services for the country then give this place to him, and let him hold the office until it is filled by appointment.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] now yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. POMEROY. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] for ten minutes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] almost obviate the necessity of my saying anything upon this subject; yet there are several matters in point which have not yet been touched; and as one having some knowledge of the construction and constitution of the Patent Office, and being somewhat familiar with the laws relating to it, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments.

Sir, if there is any objectionable feature in our mode of legislation it is the manner in which we are accustomed to pass conference reports. The other day one hundred and sixty-two Senate amendments, I believe, were reported to the tax bill, and without reading them we concurred, scarcely knowing what they were. Again, in reference to the tenure-of-office act, I believe it to be in its present terms clear and explicit enough; yet I will say that if it had not been hurriedly adopted upon the report of a committee of conference it might have been made so much clearer that those who were willing to avoid the intent of its language could not have done so. I think, sir, that in all cases where there are several amendments they should be printed, and where there is but one even it should be well discussed before final action upon it.

Now, sir, as to this particular bill, the question is not whether Mr. Hodges shall be made acting Commissioner of Patents. He may be all that is claimed; yet he may die to-morrow. Nor is the question whether General Stout, the acting chief officer of the department at present—a gallant soldier and a good lawyer—shall be continued in the performance of his present duties. General Stout may be removed by death to-morrow. The question really relates to the constitution and construction of the Patent Office, to last possibly for years to come, and at any rate until some repealing act shall be passed.

In nearly all the Departments, according to the practice heretofore, and according to the provisions of this bill, the chief clerk is the officer upon whom devolve the duties of the chief of the Department in case of a vacancy. Why should it not be so in this instance? This is a point upon which, so far as I have observed, very little argument has been given. By the third section of the act under which the chief clerk was originally appointed, and which was passed after full examination and discussion, it is provided that:

"The said Commissioner and the chief clerk shall also before entering upon their duties severally give bonds with sureties to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of $10,000 and the latter in the sum of $5,000."

My good friend from New York [Mr. POMEROY] says that Congress in altering that law in 1861 left an incongruity. Sir, it left no incongruity. It provided for the appointment of three examiners-in-chief, to whom were assigned certain duties not conflicting at all with those imposed upon the chief clerk. These examiners were not required to give bond, nor did the act of 1861 provide that the chief clerk should no longer give bond, and it was not intended that the section which I have just quoted should be repealed. Although this has been very clearly shown by the gentleman from Wisconsin, yet it may perhaps be shown still more forcibly by a reference to the interests of the inventor as involved in this question.

The second section of the act of 1861 provides—

"That, for the purpose of securing greater uniformity of action in the grant and refusal of letters-patent, there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three examiners-in-chief, at an annual salary of $3,000 each, to be composed of persons of competent legal knowledge and scientific ability."

Before proceeding further, let me remark that while this requirement is made with reference to the three examiners-in-chief, it is not so made with reference to the chief clerk or the Commissioner. The argument which has been made, if it has any soundness, would go to prove that no one should hereafter be appointed and confirmed as Commissioner unless he is a person of "competent legal knowledge and scientific ability." I acknowledge that he would undoubtedly be advantageous that he should possess these qualifications; but what is more important is that he should have a comprehensive knowledge of men and things, such as frequently fits a man better than mere book knowledge for the discharge of the supervising duties of the chief position.

The section continues:

"whose duty it shall be, on the written petition of the applicant for that purpose being filed, to revise and determine upon the validity of decisions made by examiners when adverse to the grant of letters-patent; and also to revise and determine in like manner upon the validity of the decisions of examiners in interference cases, and when required by the Commissioner in applications for the extension of patents, and to perform such other duties as may be assigned to them by the Commissioner; that from their decisions appeals may be taken to the Commissioner of Patents in person."

Now, sir, the inventor goes to the Patent Office. Suppose the examiner decides against him. He then appeals to the examiners-in-chief, and from them to the Commissioner or acting Commissioner of Patents. By this bill you will have repealed the act of July 4, 1836, making the chief clerk the acting Commissioner in case of vacancy, but not the act of March 2, 1861, defining the duties of the examiners-in-chief. You only nullify its provisions. If the senior examiner still acts as such, you will appeal from his decision as one of the board to himself as acting Commissioner—an absurdity and wrong. Of course, however, he would not act. Then, for months, perhaps, at a time, in every case of vacancy, the very provision "for the purpose of securing greater uniformity of action in the grant and refusal of letters-patent," designed to benefit inventors, is set at naught, and there will be but two examiners-in-chief.

Mark another incongruity in this report. If one of the three examiners-in-chief is taken to perform the duties of Commissioner, and of the remaining two one examiner-in-chief agrees with the examiner below and the other disagrees with him, there can be no decision from which to appeal, and many inventors of the country must go without their patents. If that is not a complete statement of the case then I do not know what is; and I hope hereafter, when a committee of conference is appointed in reference to the patent, pension, or other laws, some one shall be placed on it who has at least by his position on a committee a chance of familiarity with the workings of the department brought into question.

I hope, in conclusion, we shall not turn out a gallant, meritorious officer, who has discharged his duties efficiently, nor deprive inventors of facilities for getting their patents, which will be the case if this report be adopted, whenever and for as long a time as one of the three examiners-in-chief is taken from the performance of duties now required by law.

Mr. POMEROY. I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only one or two words. What I had intended to say has been already well said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS,] who is on the Committee of Patents.

This report, it appears to me from the statements of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POMEROY,] is for the express and sole purpose of insuring, in the place of the acting Commissioner of Patents, a man well qualified for the duties of the office, with a full, clear knowledge of the law on all the matters that can come before the office. Now, I intended to have put this question to the gentleman from New York when I rose before, whether at any time there have been any charges against the present acting Commissioner of Patents, either in reference to his capacity to discharge the duties of the office or his honesty as a man? If there have been I have never heard of them. Furthermore, I desire to say a word in regard to this gentleman himself. If the object is only to insure the efficiency of the office, then I have to say this House, from the knowledge it now has, must come to the conclusion the present acting Commissioner of Patents is as well qualified as any of the examiners-in-chief.

The question was asked whether he is a lawyer. Happening to come from the same State I do I happen to have personal knowledge on the subject. In 1842 he was licensed as a lawyer and continued in full practice, excepting four years when he served in the Army. I will add nothing to what has been so well said about his services by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] but I do fully indorse his loyalty as a man to his country. If it is really intended to promote the efficiency of the department, then we can do no better than retain him in his place.

EVENING SESSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has examined the Journal and finds the order for evening sessions expired with last week. They can be ordered, however, by a majority vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We do not want them.

The SPEAKER. If evening sessions are ordered the business will proceed in regular order. If the House adjourns to-day without providing for an evening session the adjournment will be until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We can have an evening session for general debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman know of any member who wishes to speak?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts has a contested-election case.

Mr. DAWES. It is in charge of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. COOK.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move there be a session this evening, commencing at half past seven, for business.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 62.

So the motion was disagreed to.

SUSPENDING THE RULES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] to yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a motion to suspend the rules of the House shall be in order on any day after this until the end of the present session of this Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the rule in regard to the suspension of the rules during the last ten days be read. I do not think we need any resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think we do.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If we agree on an adjournment then we will have a right to suspend the rules.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose the gentleman is aware that as soon as we agree upon a time of adjournment then for the last ten days of the session we have the power to suspend the rules; but as it is not likely we shall agree to an interval of ten days' time prior to adjournment, inasmuch as we are now no doubt within less than ten days of that time, the spirit of the rule would apply if we adopt this resolution. If gentlemen object, I will move to suspend the rules in order to offer the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would propound an inquiry to the Chair. When a resolution similar to this was introduced last year, the Speaker construed it as allowing a suspension of the rules at any time till the end of the next session of Congress. I wish to know if this will operate during this entire Congress; because certainly we of the minority are sufficiently in the hands of the majority now without being placed any more completely there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets to inform the gentleman that his memory is decidedly at fault in quoting his decision. It was unintentional, of course. The House having adopted a resolution to suspend the rules during the first session of the present Congress, the Chair held that that continued till the close of the session. The Chair could not have committed the absurdity of making any such ruling as the gentleman stated. He ruled that that was the first session of the Fortieth Congress at which the resolution was adopted, and therefore during that session the rule would apply, that is, till the end of the first session. It is now the second session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I never doubted the wisdom of the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I suppose this is a motion to let everything through without consideration.

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to allow two thirds of the House to control its own business.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It means to get through two thirds of its bad business—everything that could not be got through the House with fair discussion when there was time to attend to it. By a suspension of the rules till the close of the session I suppose it may now be brought in under this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The rule as adopted by the House provides that during the last ten days the rules—

Mr. SCHENCK. The suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is an unworthy one. He has no right to speak in that way of the purposes of anybody in this House. There are those who desire a proper performance of the duties here as well as those who object to everything.

The Speaker brought down the hammer two or three times during the foregoing remark as if to call the gentleman to order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to say I have not made any reference to the motives of the gentleman from Ohio that he should get up in such wrath, or of anybody else.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I spoke of the construction of the motion—its parliamentary construction.

Mr. SCHENCK. It was imputing an unworthy purpose.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I simply spoke of its parliamentary effect. I did not think of imputing any unworthy purpose, and the gentleman cannot daunt me by his insolent manner of address.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not attempting to daunt.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I never speak rudely to any man.

Mr. SCHENCK. These imputations of the motives of members is much too frequent on the part of some gentlemen here. It is indecent. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen are out of order so far as the Chair can distinguish the language used, and on account of the excited manner in which this colloquy is carried on by them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to inquire whether a resolution introduced when we are probably, as everybody knows, within less than ten days of the end of the session—

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. Whether such a resolution is not in accordance with the spirit of the rule which authorizes a suspension of the rules within ten days of the close of the session?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only answer that the rules as adopted by the House provide that during the last ten days of the session the rules may be suspended by a two-thirds vote. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] will now state his point of order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I was called to order and made to stop talking, and I wanted to know if the gentleman from Ohio who got up to assail me could go on?

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not get up to assail you.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: after a resolution to adjourn is agreed upon by both Houses, is it not in order from that time to the end of the session to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is.
